At present the EEOC, established by the 1964 Civil Rights Act, can only investigate and attempt to obtain voluntary compliance from employers and unions. Any legal remedy must come through federal court suits brought by the attorney general or by the individuals involved.

Both labor and civil rights groups are supporting the legislation sponsored in the Senate by Subcommittee Chairman Harrison A. Williams, Jr.

It is needed, Harris said, because the EEOC "does not have the enforcement powers it needs" and because this vacuum is filled by "multiple overlapping and conflicting remedies and agencies, which lend themselves to unwarranted harassment of unions and employers."

A single case of alleged discrimination, Harris noted, might now come before two federal courts on different grounds, before a state court, the NLRB, a state or city fair employment commission, the Dept. of Labor if the employer is a federal contractor, as well as the EEOC.

While the decisions of the EEOC under the Williams bill would be subject to review by federal appellate courts—as is the case with NLRB decisions—this would be less time-consuming than initiating the cases in district courts, Harris noted.

In addition, the Williams bill would transfer to the EEOC the power the Labor Dept. now has to deny government contracts to companies that discriminate in employment. That, Harris suggested, is a "formidable" sanction which would give the EEOC a strong weapon to compel compliance.

The AFL-CIO attorney praised the proposed legislation as far preferable to an Administration bill that would merely authorize the EEOC to go to court on behalf of complainants. The Administration bill is before the Senate Judiciary Committee, rather than the Labor Committee.

Harris stressed that the AFL-CIO has always supported strong fair employment legislation applying equally to employers and unions. But he said neither group should be subjected to overlapping and inconsistent enforcement procedures.

3 Hospitals Accept SCME Training Pacts

Boston—At least 335 low-paid workers in three hospitals here will be trained and upgraded under agreements signed by the State, County & Municipal Employes and city and hospital officials.

The pacts are part of SCME's over-all training program to bring new job opportunities and higher pay to 1,000 workers in Boston, Cleveland and Milwaukee hospitals with a grant of $1.2 million from the Departments of Labor and Health, Education & Welfare.

Mrs. Betty Miller, assistant to SCME Pres. Jerry Wurf and national director for the program, described the project as significant for two reasons:

"This is probably the first time that public institutions in the country have agreed to pay their lower level employes while they train. It also opens dead-end hospital jobs to career employment."

The hospitals involved here are Boston City, Mattapan and Long Island. They will provide classroom space and all equipment needed for training. Hospital personnel will serve as instructors.

Trainees here, picked by joint union-hospital committees, will spend half of their 40-hour workweeks in training. Midway through his course, a trainee will receive 50 percent of the difference between his present wage and the higher-paid job for which he is being trained. He will get the full higher rate once training is finished.

GOP Outspent Democrats on '68 Campaign

In terms of votes, it was one of the closest elections in the nation's history. But measured by money spent for television and radio time, the 1968 presidential election was a runaway victory for the Republicans.

Statistics compiled by the Federal Communications Commission show that the Nixon-Agnew ticket spent nearly $12.6 million for television and radio time during the presidential campaign.

That's more than twice the $6.1 million spent for air time on behalf of the Humphrey-Muskie slate.

A further breakdown of the figures by Congressional Quarterly magazine shows the GOP presidential slate spent $4.2 million for network television, compared to $2.5 million for the Democratic ticket, and outspent the Democratic candidates $4.8 million to $2 million for local television time. The total radio time bought amounted to $3.6 million for Nixon-Agnew, compared with $1.7 million for Humphrey-Muskie.

For candidates for all offices during the 1968 general election campaign, Republicans spent $22.5 million for air time against $15.4 million for the Democrats and $2.5 million for minor party candidates.

While Republicans generally outspend the Democrats in buying television and radio time, the gap last year was by far the greatest. In 1964, Republican candidates outspent the Democrats only $13 million to $11 million; in 1960, the gap was $7.6 million to $6.2 million, and in the 1956 election, $5.4 to $4.1 million.

Steelworkers Issue Warning On Bond Rates

Pittsburgh—Unless Congress acts quickly to raise interest rates on U.S. Savings Bonds, the Steelworkers will reverse union policy and urge members not to buy bonds.

USWA Pres. I. W. Abel said the union and the labor movement have traditionally supported purchase of Savings Bonds because it was in the national interest and an ideal way for workers to save money.

But the current interest rate of only 4.25 percent on Savings Bonds "is unrealistic and discriminates against workers who must rely upon their purchase of such bonds as a chief means of saving," Abel said.

He pointed out that people in upper incomes with money to invest in stocks, tax-exempt bonds and Treasury bills enjoy interest rates well above 4.25 percent. "Just because workers do not have the money to invest in such issues, is no reason to penalize them for the money they do invest," Abel added.

Building Crafts Vote Plans To Spur Jobs for Negroes

ACCELERATED PROGRAMS to bring more members of minority groups into the construction crafts were voted by delegates to the 55th convention of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. in Atlantic City, N.J. These efforts should be developed without undercutting established apprenticeship programs, Pres. C. J. Haggerty, right, of the BCTD told the convention. Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers addresses the session in photo on left.

Delegates Reject 'Quota' Approach

By Eugene A. Kelly

Atlantic City—Affirmative action programs to bring more members of minority groups into the construction industry were approved here by delegates to the 55th convention of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

More than 300 delegates from 3,000 local unions with 3.5 million members called for the "acceleration and extension of the Apprenticeship Outreach training program launched two years ago to bring more minority representatives into the construction work force.

They recommended that local unions invite "qualified minority journeymen" to apply for membership, and urged vigorous pursuit of training programs for upgrading minority workers who are not of apprenticeship age.

By unanimous vote the convention adopted a policy statement submitted by the executive council of the department opposing employment "quota" or "rate range" systems for contractors, as under the Labor Dept.'s "revised Philadelphia Plan" and other "unsound or unlawful" measures, whether proposed by the federal government or groups of black militants. (Excerpts, Page 7.)

The delegates rose to their feet in applause for AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's emphatic declaration of support for the Building Trades' policy of training minority workers and his declaration that "no matter what happens, don't lower your standards."

Meany told the convention that "handing out journeymen's cards without proper qualifications is no answer to the minority problem."

There is a basis for a coopera-

Senate Asked To Bolster Tax Reform

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called on the Senate to strengthen, not dismantle, the tax reform bill passed by the House more than six weeks ago.

He outlined to the Senate Finance Committee labor's program for tax justice, which includes these essential principles:

- Equal tax treatment of all income, whether it comes from profit on investments or from earned wages.
- An income tax structure based on ability to pay.

Meany was one of the few witnesses before the Senate committee to argue for even tighter loophole closing than that provided by the House bill and to speak out against Nixon Administration proposals that would provide lower taxes for corporations but higher taxes for middle income families than the House voted. (Summary of AFL-CIO statement on Page 10.)

Says He's 'Sorry' About That:

Stock Deal Mere Oversight, Judge Haynsworth Insists

By David L. Perlman

Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., told the Senate Judiciary Committee that he was "sorry" he bought $16,000 worth of stock of a company whose case was still before his court and promised he would be more careful about such things in the future.

The South Carolina judge, nominated to the Supreme Court by Pres. Nixon, said he "simply did not recall" that a decision in a case involving the Brunswick Corp. had not been handed down when his broker recommended that he buy 1,000 shares of Brunswick stock.

When he realized the situation, Haynsworth told the committee, he didn't bother to inform his fellow judges on the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals because he was sure they would have agreed with him that there was no real conflict of interest.

Haynsworth's supporters on the conservative-dominated committee assured the judge that they weren't the least bit disturbed by his actions in that case, any more than they were upset by his role in the Deering Milliken case or the ramifications of his million-dollar investment portfolio or his record of reversals by the Supreme Court on labor and civil rights cases.

Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) uncovered the Brunswick episode after Haynsworth, in his first appearance before the committee, had said he never sat as a judge when he owned stock in a company which was a direct party to the case.

A subsequent check of cases decided by Haynsworth, compared with his list of stock holdings, uncovered the conflict. The Justice Dept. then assured the committee that the case was a relatively unimportant one that would not have affected the price of the stock.

This brought a retort from the AFL-CIO that "the conduct of Judge Haynsworth in the Brunswick case shows again the indifference to ethical niceties which has marked his tenure on the bench."

The AFL-CIO said the Justice Dept. statement was further evi-

Senate Acts on Housing, Boosts Food Stamp Aid

The Senate voted major expansions of the government's housing and food stamp programs, going substantially beyond the Nixon Administration's recommendations.

On housing, the Administration had sought only a routine extension and consolidation of existing programs.

But the Senate, with bipartisan support, shouted voice vote approval of legislation including these new features:

- Rental subsidies for people too poor to afford even public housing rents.

In effect, it extends to public housing the rent subsidy program

Abel Defines IUD Role, Pledges Harmony, Vigor

Atlantic City—The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. is "alive and well" and intends to continue serving member unions in harmony and not in conflict with the federation of which it is a part, Pres. I. W. Abel said in opening the IUD's eighth convention—his first as presiding officer.

"We are part of a team and will function as part of that team," said Abel, who also heads the million-member Steelworkers. "We will supplement, not compete. We will support, not detract. We will march with, not walk alone."

"There has been too much division in the labor movement," Abel said. "So we will maintain a friendly and cooperative relationship with the AFL-CIO. And our actions in the future will be in harmony, not in conflict, with the policies of our parent organization, the AFL-CIO."

Since the last convention in 1967 the IUD has added four affiliates and lost two, for a total of 61 affiliated unions with 5.66 million members.

It has halted the "rapid deple-

SIDNEY HILLMAN AWARD is presented to David A. Morse, left, who has served as director-general of the International Labor Organization for 21 years. The presentation was made by Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers. United Nations Sec.-Gen. U Thant, right, headed the list of speakers at the presentation dinner in New York.

ILO's Morse Receives Sidney Hillman Award

New York—David A. Morse, secretary-general of the International Labor Organization for 21 years, received the Sidney Hillman Award for meritorious public service as "an international civil servant" dedicated "to the highest goals of human equality and freedom."

United Nations Sec.-Gen. U Thant, trade union leaders, and a bi-partisan group of political figures gathered at a dinner here to honor the Hillman award winner.

U Thant had high praise for Morse and added his appreciation to the "leadership of the labor movement whose ideals for the betterment of the human community are identical with those of the United Nations."

Thant said the UN regarded the Hillman award as "recognition of the UN system as a whole as well as a personal honor to Morse." The ILO is an agency of the United Nations and has just celebrated its 50th anniversary as the only surviving agency of the League of Nations.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland conveyed the best wishes of Federation Pres. George Meany and said, Morse "richly deserves the gratitude and respect of the trade union movement."

Kirkland noted that the climate in the ILO among its 120 member states can often become "abrasive." The AFL-CIO, he added, has sometimes contributed to the inflicting of those abrasions at times and would do so again "when the occasion arises." But, he added, the federation knew it was leaving the day-to-day responsibilities of that "vital, essential body to men like Morse."

"We do believe," said Kirkland, "that the ILO must be kept alive and made effective for the good of all men. . . . Its survival is a testimonial to Morse's durability, grace and unfailing devotion" over the years.

"You have helped to keep alive and bright, the flame of hope to millions of the put-upon and lowly all over the world," he said.

Other speakers included Howard D. Samuel, executive vice president of the Clothing Workers and executive director of the Sidney Hillman Foundation; Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz, and former Sec. of Labor Willard Wirtz.

ACWA President Jacob S. Potofsky, who is also president of Hillman Foundation, presented the award and a check for $1,000 to Morse saying, "the idealism and philosophy which gave birth to the ILO also motivated much of what Sidney Hillman sought to accomplish. It is a philosophy which views the welfare of working people in the broadest terms, far beyond the confines of the factory or shop."

Morse told the dinner guests the nations of the world would have to stop thinking of social problems in "predominantly national terms."

"The world is now so small that glaring inequalities and injustices within as well as between nations, can touch off serious international conflict. Today more than ever, more social justice and social progress must be matters of international concern."

The Sidney Hillman Foundation was created in 1946 by the Clothing Workers and employers in the men's clothing industry to honor the memory and preserve the ideals of the founding president of the union.

Scott, Griffin New Leaders Of Senate GOP

Sen. Hugh Scott of Pennsylvania and Sen. Robert P. Griffin of Michigan are the new leaders of the Republicans in the Senate. Scott was chosen as minority leader to succeed the late Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen. Scott defeated Sen. Howard H. Baker, Jr., of Tennessee, 24-19, at a party caucus.

Scott's election marked the first time that the Senate GOP, traditionally dominated by the conservative wing, has elected a moderate as their leader.

Baker, Dirksen's son-in-law, became the candidate of the conservatives when Sen. Roman L. Hruska of Nebraska withdrew from the leadership contest in favor of the Tennessean.

Following Scott's election, the caucus chose Griffin to replace Scott as assistant leader or whip. Baker again was the loser. This time the final vote against him was 23-20.

Abel Spells Out Role of IUD, Stresses Union Coordination

tion" of its treasury while maintaining essential IUD services and retaining a "top-flight organizing staff," continuing the department's data-processing service, assisting the AFL-CIO in its legislative program and sponsoring an occupational health and safety conference, the president reported.

"We have had to tighten our belt and rely on a somewhat reduced staff," Abel said, "but we have retained our vigor, dedication, vision and determination."

In November, he noted, IUD is sponsoring a conference on the "Crisis in Health Care" to inform all unions of problems and opportunities in an important area of concern.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany spelled out the federation's position on two current issues—tax justice for the working poor and those with moderate incomes and the seating of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr. on the Supreme Court as an associate justice.

Haynsworth "is no doubt a fine southern gentleman," Meany said, but he lacks the "ethical sensitivity" a Supreme Court justice should have. Meany contrasted Haynsworth's refusal to disqualify himself from ruling on a Deering Milliken case with that of former Justice Arthur Goldberg who withdrew from a Textile Workers' case because he once served the union as legal counsel.

Meany quoted the opinions of Senators Paul J. Fannin (R-Ariz.) and Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) last year to the effect that judges should avoid even the appearance of partiality and a recent report by Sen. Sam J. Ervin, Jr. (D-N.C.) that a set of ethical standards for judges is "sorely needed."

"It will be interesting," Meany said, "to see if the senators will have changed their opinions when they vote on the confirmation of Judge Haynsworth." All have indicated they favor Haynsworth's confirmation.

On the subject of taxes, the AFL-CIO president said the present federal tax system is "rigged against the people whose income is from wages and in favor of those who profit from investments."

In effect the present system has a triple standard, he declared — one for wage-earners who pay full taxes, deducted from their pay; a second for those who have stocks, real estate or capital assets, who cannot by law be taxed more than 25 percent; and the third for income from tax writeoffs and other avenues of escape, who pay nothing.

"We're completely opposed," he stressed, "to the Nixon Administration's rejection" of even a moderate tax cut for middle-income families—an attitude he called "a shocking display of concern for the wealthy."

The convention called on the Senate to reject the Haynsworth nomination. Also it voted "warmest appreciation" to Meany for his leadership of the labor movement and expressed the hope that his "great gifts" will continue to be devoted to that service.

The convention agenda includes a proposed change in the per capita rate, expansion of IUD's national industrial pension plan for small and medium-sized employer units; expanded coverage of two small-group insurance plans, and talks on labor-minority group cooperation by Clarence Mitchell of the NAACP in Washington and on legislative prospects by U.S. Senators Fred R. Harris (D-Okla.), chairman of the Democratic National Committee; Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.), and Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.).

Abel put coordinated bargaining high on the list of issues immediately concerning union members. Effective and realistic collective bargaining, he emphasized depends on "some semblance of equality" at the bargaining table.

He said there has been "a growing concentration of corporate wealth, as signified in the creation and growth of conglomerate" firms. "And I say that this constitutes a real threat to the collective bargaining process . . . because it tilts the balance scales in favor of industry."

Characterizing a conglomerate as "the kind of a business that services industry the way Bonnie and Clyde serviced banks," Abel declared:

"It is not a one-industry operation. It is an octopus with each tentacle a different product. It is an outgrowth of the greatest wave of mergers in American history.

"And it is this type of corporate structure that lends itself best to strikebreaking and union-busting."

Abel emphasized that the rapid growth of corporate power has made coordinated bargaining by labor "more vital to union progress than ever before. And it is in this area that the IUD can play a major role."

Abel called the delegates to work for an improved system of occupational health and safety for workers including federal standards, a department of occupational health and safety in the AFL-CIO, a national health insurance system, and guaranteed payment of pensions to workers under privately financed plans.

Abel warned of the influence of a growing new force—automation, encouraged by tax concessions. We must, he said "think now of measures which will head off a new broad round of unemployment" and the next recession.

He urged that the "entire labor movement begin immediately to strengthen our economic foundation in a substantial way by demanding a shorter workweek."

Hopes of Improved Jobless Benefits Dimmed by Wait for State Action

There's one big fallacy in the Nixon Administration's decision to ask the states, rather than Congress, to set higher unemployment insurance benefit standards, according to an AFL-CIO analysis.

It was tried 15 years ago. It didn't work then. And it's no more likely to work now.

Reliance on the states to improve standards is a throwback to the Eisenhower Administration, observes James O'Brien, an unemployment insurance specialist in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

In a recent message on improving unemployment insurance, Pres. Nixon urged the states to increase maximum unemployment benefits so that nearly all workers could receive one-half of their normal pay when they are unemployed. That's what Pres. Eisenhower urged in 1954.

Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz later followed with a statement that the states made progress in improving benefits between 1955 and 1960.

But O'Brien contends that a study of the record shows attempts by the states to improve benefits between 1955 and 1968 were a "dismal failure."

After all these years, only two states meet the recommended standard. And only seven states allow maximum unemployment compensation benefits of more than the poverty level of $3,335 a year set by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare. This comes out to $64.14 a week.

The Administration is asking the states to step up their standards over the next two years.

But "it is not unreasonable to assure that the state will respond to the urging of Pres. Nixon in the same fashion that they responded to urging of Pres. Eisenhower," O'Brien warns.

"Eisenhower pleaded in vain to have the states enact benefit provisions in their laws that would provide the great majority of workers with a benefit equal to at least 50 percent of their average weekly wage.

Benefit levels, O'Brien noted, as a percentage of the statewide average weekly wages declined between 1954 and 1960 in 15 states and remained steady in three other states.

Changes in benefits in 15 other states during 1954-60 were negligible, O'Brien observed. Weekly benefits of these states was raised a mere 5 percent of the average weekly wage, although coverage was extended by 28 percent.

O'Brien does not share the optimism of Sec. Shultz of the possibility the states will respond the President's urging on improving benefits.

"If we don't succeed," Shultz said, "we will be looking to Congress for action."

This means, however, that the states will have two full years to act or not. Only then has the Administration promised any direction on its own toward setting federal standards.

Nixon suggested that "if the program is to fulfill its role, it is essential that the benefit maximum be raised. A maximum of two-thirds of the average wage in the state would result in benefits of 50 percent in wages to at least 80 percent of insured workers."

The Administration's proposal to Congress would extend coverage to some 4.8 million of the 17 million persons not now protected, and would establish an additional period of federal benefits during severe national recessions. It also contains some provisions which would make it harder for workers to qualify for unemployment compensation.

While some of the Administration's recommendations are desirable, others would actually worsen the program, according to Bert Seidman director of the federation's Dept. of Social Security.

The AFL-CIO has pressed for coverage of all wage and salary workers to be eligible for benefits after 20 weeks of work

The federation also has urged flexible maximum weekly benefit amounts—set as a percentage of wages—so they will automatically rise as wages and salaries go up.

Labor's proposals further ask that each state allow at least 26 weeks to every claimant, with extended benefits for workers with a long job history.

Orders 1,000 Reinstated:

Court Upholds IAM On Airline Lockout

New Orleans—National Airlines must reinstate more than 1,000 Machinists' members it locked out and fired last January in violation of the Railway Labor Act, the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals has ruled.

The decision reversed an earlier ruling by U.S. District Judge C. Clyde Atkins of Miami, Fla., and remanded the case to him for precise determination of the reinstatement date.

In Washington, IAM Vice Pres. William W. Winpisinger, head of the union's transportation department, hailed the decision as a "first."

"For the first time," he said, "an employer in contract negotiations violating procedures of the act has been told he cannot victimize his employes and get away with it.

"This is a great victory for the locked-out IAM members, for the thousands of members of the IAM and other unions who have been contributing to their support, and for the IAM itself."

The union has been involved in contract negotiations with National since last year but the litigation arose from action taken by the management in mid-January.

The airline suspended three IAM mechanics at Kennedy International Airport in New York when they refused to move planes from terminal to hangar with two-man crews, as management unilaterally had decreed. The union has long held that two-man crews are unsafe.

The suspensions resulted in a protest work stoppage by more than 1,000 union members at New York, Miami and several other large cities. The work stoppage became a lockout, IAM said, when National ordered the employes to return to work or be fired.

Few of the workers did return and National has since been flying on reduced schedules with light passenger loads, using supervisors, some new hires and a few regular employes to maintain service, the IAM said.

Management sought an injunction from the U.S. District Court in Miami and Judge Atkins ruled that the company's action in ordering the men fired was not in violation of the act. The union appealed the case.

The Appeals Court ruling, written by Judge Homer Thornberry, charged National with acting "too hastily" in firing its mechanics and other aircraft maintenance employes.

The "mass discharge of the strikers exceeded the permissible bounds of employer self-help under the circumstances," Judge Thornberry declared.

He fully upheld the union's contention that National violated the status quo provisions of the act, which regulates contract bargaining on airlines and railroads.

Those provisions, IAM maintained, require an employer to keep the status quo in wages and working conditions after a notice for negotiations has been served and the employer has responded to it.

IAM Chief Counsel Plato Papps and Atty. Joseph Manners of Miami, who handled the case for the union, said that the reinstatement date should be Jan. 24, or "within a few days of the incident that triggered the mass firing."

Although Judge Thornberry did not specifically deal with the backpay and benefits due employes, Papps said reinstatement of the men implied back pay for all to the reinstatement date.

In another court action, the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Washington, D. C., has set Oct. 15 for a hearing on a District Court decision won by the IAM and opposed by the Justice Dept. and National Airlines.

District Judge Gerhard A. Gesell ordered the National Mediation Board to make a proffer or arbitration and halt its long, unproductive mediation—more than six months—in the contract dispute.

Once the arbitration proffer is turned down by either side, the union will be free to take economic action at the end of a 30-day waiting period. Until such a proffer is made, union members cannot strike.

Income Gap Remains as Wide Despite a Lessening of Poverty

That old saying about the rich getting richer and the poor getting poorer "isn't quite the case," an article in the September issue of the American Federationist points out.

"What is really happening," it emphasizes, "is that the rich are getting richer and the poor are moving up—slowly. And there are real problems in the middle, for those who are neither rich nor poor."

The article—Incomes: Who's Getting What?—reaches its conclusion based on the latest government figures on incomes plus an analysis of recent studies on "the distribution—or concentration—of the nation's wealth."

The author, Arnold Cantor, an AFL-CIO economist, also discusses what the government has been doing to "alter the distribution" of income and what he believes needs to be done.

Cantor cites Census Bureau figures to show that in 1967 the poorest 20 percent of the nation's families received only 5.4 percent of the income, the highest 20 percent received 41.2 percent, and the richest 5 percent got 17.2 percent.

A comparison of these statistics with 1947 figures, he notes, reveals that "no appreciable change has been made in the ways in which the nation's income-pie is divided" over the past 20 years.

Cantor adds, however, that Census figures "probably obscure more than they reveal" when relating to the wealthy because they fail to include income from stocks, bonds, other property, gifts and inheritances.

He cites "definitive" studies showing that the richest 1 percent of adults held 21 percent of the nation's wealth in 1949, 26 percent in 1956, and 28 percent in 1958.

According to one of the studies, this top 1 percent in 1958 also held 76 percent of the tax-exempt state and local bonds, 71 percent of corporate stocks and 16 percent of the nation's real estate.

Turning to the poorest one-fifth of the families—the group that received only one-twentieth of the income in 1967—Cantor explains that "most of these families were existing on incomes below the government's poverty income threshold."

Even so, Cantor writes, there have been "rather marked improvements" in reducing the proportion of total population living in poverty. It was cut from 22 percent in 1960 to 13 percent in 1968.

Despite this improvement, the article stresses, "a sizable poor segment remains, as does an additional group of the near-poor," even though the nation has the resources to completely eliminate poverty.

Nothing New for Workers

"Something else emerges from statistics of the census takers and other analysts," Cantor writes, "something workers and their families have known for quite some time. . . .

"We have also reached a point where greater emphasis must be placed on the needs, the problems and inequities that are chipping away at the living standards of those who find themselves in the middle."

Proof of this, the article states, is found in Labor Dept. figures showing a decline in the buying power of workers' paychecks and their inability to meet a "modest" standard of living as defined by the government.

What can be done?

To eliminate poverty, Cantor says, the government must create more jobs, improve wage levels, make social security more adequate and strengthen welfare services.

Programs of public spending, skill training and job upgrading, equitable monetary policy, support for collective bargaining and tax reform to close loopholes for the rich will help both the poor and the man in the middle, he points out.

Cantor observes that for centuries there has been debate over whether income should be distributed, with some holding that it should be divided evenly and others calling for government hands-off.

"The real question, however," he declares, "is not whether income and wealth should be distributed equally, but how much inequality is appropriate and consistent with our economic and social goals. In a free society, this issue is one of continuing importance."

Apprentice Rolls Jump As Demand Increases

Apprenticeship programs in 1968 enrolled a record 103,000 entrants, almost 6,000 more than a year earlier, Labor Sec. George P. Shultz reported.

Yet, the number of skilled workers being graduated by the programs is still not meeting the needs of the nation's growing economy, Shultz said.

He noted that the apprenticeship training system certified 33,700 completions last year—a 9 percent decline "at a time when skilled workers were in great demand."

The record number of registrants in apprenticeship programs will have no immediate effect on the need for skilled workers, he added, since most apprentices work four-year terms to gain necessary skills.

"Thus, the bulk of completions this year represent mostly those who began four years ago," Shultz said, "and we only had 68,500 new starts in 1965."

He expressed optimism over current figures that indicate a cancellation rate of 38 percent, "a heartening note when you consider that it is usually about 50 percent most of the time."

The 238,000 apprentices registered with the Labor Dept. and state apprenticeship agencies as of Jan. 1 also was the highest since records on the programs were kept, beginning in 1941.

Minorities accounted for 7 percent of the total number of registered apprentices and slightly more than half of these were Negroes, the Labor Dept. said.

AFL-CIO Now Using New Phone System

The AFL-CIO headquarters building has converted to a new "centrex" telephone system that permits direct dialing to all staff personnel as well as to the building itself.

The new AFL-CIO number is 293-5000. The area code, of course, remains 202.

The new number for the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education (COPE) is 293-5101.

N.Y. Builders, Crafts Set Up Urban Fund

New York—The New York Building & Construction Trades Council and the city's construction employers have joined in setting up a Board of Urban Affairs Fund to help resolve common problems and set future goals.

The fund, to be administered by six trustees from labor and six from management, will be financed by employer contributions of 1 cent for each man hour worked by building tradesmen covered by contracts.

Labor trustees are Council Pres. Peter J. Brennan, Sec.-Treas. Thomas W. Tobin, Charles Johnson, Jr., George Daly, Pat J. Christiano and Joseph Salimbene.

Donald F. Rogers, executive director of the fund, said that one of its main functions will be to coordinate and advise unions and employers on job-training programs.

SCME Settles 8-Day Strike At University

East Lansing, Mich.—Nearly 1,400 food services and maintenance employes at Michigan State University, represented by the State, County & Municipal Employes, have ratified a new contract to end an eight-day strike.

The workers struck on Sept. 11 after four months of negotiations and mediation failed to resolve a dispute.

The new pact, covering one year for wages and two years for non-economic areas, provides pay increases ranging from 26 to 33 cents an hour, plus shift differentials. Higher wage proposals for lower-paid employes will be submitted to arbitration.

The contract also contains vacation improvements and a hospitalization plan. There will be study committees to examine retirement policies and the need for upgrading pob classifications.

The union, which represents 6,000 workers at 12 state-supported universities and colleges in Michigan, has now negotiated six contracts this year and is in negotiations on four others. Two pacts are not open this year.

The SCME noted that 11 of the contracts provide for either an agency or union shop. Union security is a major issue in bargaining at Ferris State, the only institution with neither an agency nor union shop.

ILPA Issues New Directory Of Publications

Union periodicals in 34 states, three Canadian provinces and the District of Columbia, with a combined circulation of 20 million, are listed in the new seventh edition of the Labor Press Directory of the AFL-CIO International Labor Press Association.

The ILPA directory is issued each year.

Of the 383 publications listed, 104 are published by international or national unions, and 270 by state, province and city central bodies, individual local unions or groups of local unions. (Some central body papers are privately owned but endorsed by the central body, which also sets policy.) The remaining nine are official publications of the AFL-CIO or its departments, and the official publication of the Canadian Labor Congress.

New York state leads in number of publications with 72, followed by California with 27.

The directory lists the name and address of each publication, name of editor, frequency of publication, format, circulation and whether the publication accepts paid advertising (124 of them do).

The directory also contains the 10-point Code of Ethics to which all members must adhere; a list of advertising agencies which serve labor publications; a list of ILPA's own publications; the names of associate members, who are public relations men of unions, and a roster of regional associations affiliated with ILPA.

Copies may be ordered from Kenneth Fiester, ILPA secretary-treasurer, AFL-CIO Building, 815 16th Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006. The price is $2.

CLASS REPRESENTATIVE Aviz do A. Valente of Brazil receives his diploma at graduation exercises from the third Labor Economists Training Program of the American Institute for Free Labor Development. The Rev. Robert J. Henle, S.J., president of Georgetown University—where the courses were held—made the presentations.

Latin Unionists Urged To Speak for People

Twenty Latin American trade unionists—graduates of the American Institute for Free Labor Development's third training program for labor economists—were urged by AFL-CIO leaders to be the "voice of the people" when they return to their own nations.

The course for the group was conducted by the AIFLD in cooperation with Georgetown University.

In addressing the graduates, Communications Workers Pres. Joseph A. Beirne accused certain Latin American labor ministers of "hypocrisy" in promises to seek labor participation in making policy affecting the people.

When the question was raised at the last conference of the labor ministers in Caracas as to how effectively these promises were being carried out, Beirne said the "official" answer finally came:

"Organized labor had no skilled trained people to understand the broad economic problems of their own countries."

"You are the third group to go through this long, extensive AIFLD course . . . hopefully to answer the argument of Caracas," said Beirne, who is secretary-treasurer of the AIFLD, "you are the trained, skilled people with the overall view of economics and the politics of this hemisphere.

"Maybe there will be just one of you who will go back and say 'I want to get into the power structure of my nation,' who will recognize that people are more important than profits—human rights much more important than property rights."

Role of Unions

AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger told the audience that "trade unions serve to humanize the economic system—to represent the needs and aspirations of workers on the job and also before the agencies of government and the legislature."

To do this properly he said, "unions must be armed with the needed facts and figures . . . with the needed concepts and analysis to advance the interest of the workers and the population in general."

Class representative Aviz do A. Valente of Brazil urged the AIFLD to organize and finance similar training courses in Latin American countries, saying, "Our unions need hundreds of technicians in all fields and at all levels of knowledge, especially in economics. But we cannot wait for long. We need them in short order."

Graduates of the program came from Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru and Venezuela.

Vermont Labor Backs Quest of Farm Workers

Montpelier, Vt.—Farm workers' demands are as basic as wanting better lives than animals, a leader in the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee told the annual Vermont AFL-CIO convention.

Marco Munoz, UFWOC's director in New England and a veteran of hard toil on California's factory-farms, told of working with as many as 200 people who drank water from the same rusty can.

"Often, I was jealous when I saw a dog with his own water container," he said, adding: "I don't want to be a dog. But I want to live better than he does."

Munoz's address drew a standing ovation from the 200 delegates. A collection brought in nearly $350 to aid the farm workers' organizing efforts. The convention adopted a resolution pledging an all-out drive to help spread the boycott of California grapes throughout New England.

Among the more than 20 resolutions adopted by the delegates were calls for repeal of Vermont's "repressive" 4 percent sales tax and higher wages for state and municipal employes.

Other actions urged extension and improvement of workmen's compensation, passage of a bill in Congress by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) to create more jobs in public employment, voting rights for 18-year-olds and greater promotion of union-label shopping.

The convention asked the state legislature to authorize a bond issue to aid the Caverly Child Health Center at Pittsford, Vt. State unions have participated in a number of drives to help the institution in its care of handicapped children.

One resolution called on the state to accept the gift of the Bundy Art Gallery at Warren, Vt. The private owner offered the collection to the state last year, but to date the government has done nothing about accepting it.

The convention re-elected Pres. Ralph E. Williams to his eighth term; Sec.-Treas. Arthur George; and Executive Vice Pres. Martin Berger. Mrs. Jane Noury was re-elected director of the state's Women's Activities Division.

Also elected were 17 regional vice presidents. Twelve of them are incumbents and five were elected for the first time.

Musicians Share $5 Million Fund

New York—About 18,000 members of the Musicians will share nearly $5 million being distributed by an AFM fund based on phonograph record sales.

Record manufacturers who participate in the AFM agreement contribute to the fund on the basis of annual record sales. Each AFM member who made phonograph records receives a payment in proportion to his annual wage from recordings in relation to total wages paid to all union musicians.

This is the fifth consecutive year for recording payments, reported AFM Pres. Herman D. Kenin. With this year's payments, the fund distribution totals $15 million.

To Explore Labor Problems:

Nixon Names Panel On Building Industry

Pres. Nixon has established a tripartite Construction Industry Collective Bargaining Commission and asked its members to seek voluntary solutions to a broad range of problems.

He named four union, four management and four public members, including Labor Sec. George P. Shultz, who will serve as chairman.

Nixon assigned to the commission two major tasks:

- To explore such problems as "training and development of construction manpower, instability and seasonality of employment opportunities, productivity and mobility of the construction labor force."
- Development of "voluntary tripartite procedures in settling disputes."

The President said the participation of "a third party representing the public" is "clearly desirable." But he stressed that the intent is to facilitate the collective bargaining process and not compulsory arbitration or abandonment of the right to strike or lockout.

Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., said the unions "always are willing to accept an invitation of the President of the United States to participate in discussions of construction problems. We feel it is highly desirable that our experience and viewpoint be presented and carefully considered before any governmental programs are enunciated."

He termed the President's executive order establishing the commission "consistent with the principle of voluntarism in labor relations."

Haggerty will serve on the commission as will Pres. M. A. Hutcheson of the Carpenters, Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters and Pres. Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers.

Public members, in addition to Shultz, are Housing & Urban Development Sec. George P. Romney; J. Curtis Counts, director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, and Dr. John T. Dunlop of Harvard University, who will serve as secretary.

Alternate members will be named after consultation with unions and employers.

In response to a question, Shultz said establishment of the commission was not directly related to the pressure of black militants for more jobs in the construction industry. But he said this would undoubtedly be considered by the commission as one of the problems confronting the industry.

The following day, at a news conference attended by other top government officials, Shultz announced that the so-called Philadelphia Plan would go into effect despite a ruling by the Comptroller General that it establishes an illegal quota system in violation of the Civil Rights Act.

Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell issued a formal opinion upholding the legality of the plan, declaring that the specifications for minority group representation in the skilled trades represents a "goal" and not a quota.

Under the plan, contractors bidding on major federally-financed construction in the Philadelphia area must pledge to make a good-faith effort to employ a specified ratio of racial minorities in six skilled crafts—with the ratio rising by stages until in 1973 it reaches between one-fifth and one-fourth of the workforce.

To achieve the specified ratio, the Justice Dept. said in its interpretation of the Labor Dept. order, "an employer may be forced to depart from his customary reliance on union referrals."

The six trades named were: ironworkers, plumbers-pipefitters, steamfitters, sheet metal workers, electrical workers and elevator construction workers.

Wyoming Convention Accents Political Action

Rawlings, Wyo.—Repeal of the Wyoming "right-to-work" law and the re-election of Sen. Gale W. McGee (D) are the key objectives in an all-out political action campaign adopted by the Wyoming State AFL-CIO.

Although the state legislature does not reconvene until 1971, the state labor federation voted at its biennial convention to launch a drive on the anti-labor statute.

Pres. Mark E. Nicksic of the state labor body noted the crippling effect the law has had on workers' wages in the past six years.

Before the "right-to-work" law was adopted in 1963, wages in Wyoming were above the national average, Nicksic said, "while today, they are substantially under the national average."

Two earlier attempts to have the law repealed fell short of passage by one vote each time, he said. Nicksic promised a concerted effort to gain additional strength in the state senate to bring about the recall of the "right-to-work" law.

The State AFL-CIO is considering a proposal to hold a special convention next year centered on the 1970 elections and political activity.

McGee told the 200 delegates at the three-day convention of the need for true income tax justice. He warned that the Administration's proposals for reform fall short of tax relief for the working man and woman while doing little to curb loopholes for the upper income bracket.

Gov. Stanley K. Hathaway (R) reported that his administration is attempting to bring added industry into Wyoming in an effort to expand job opportunities for workers. But he said that certain conservative elements in the state are trying to thwart the drive for wider industrialization because of their own selfish interests.

Other speakers were James C. O'Brien, political action director of the Steelworkers; Paul Bachman, Wyoming state labor commissioner; J. J. Twombley, regional director of the Operating Engineers, and Jack E. McCoy, COPE area director.

Reject 'Quota' Approach:

Building Trades Adopt Plans To Spur Jobs for Negroes

tive relationship in "recruiting and preparing and placing minority group people into the ranks of both apprentices and journeymen, he declared, but this can only be done by maintaining the skills, standards, wages and working conditions of all."

The statement said, "We support the right of the Negro to justice. But we cannot accept the simplistic idea that the arithmetic of a population ratio should become the standard for selection and entry into employment" of construction workers.

Emphasizing that the Apprenticeship Outreach programs "have proved successful in actual operation," the statement adopted by the delegates declared: "We make the flat and un-qualified recommendation to local unions" that "for a stated period of time they should invite the application of qualified minority journeymen for membership . . . and should accept all such qualified journeymen provided they meet the ordinary and equally administered requirements" for membership.

Such programs, the convention said, "should be developed in such a manner as to prevent undercutting the established apprenticeship programs." Recommendations previously made by Dept. Pres. C. J. Haggerty and put into effect by the Labor Dept. in the Model Cities program "should furnish an appropriate guideline for development of these journeyman training programs."

Supporters of programs to effectuate the rights of Negroes and other minority workers must not forget, the statement said, the rights of those already employed, "regardless of their color or race."

"They have played a large part in creating the favorable labor standards of the present" and do not deserve to lose their "rightful share" of employment opportunities.

The goal of increasing minority group representation in the building trades "can be accomplished with due regard to the rights of the existing workforce," the statement continued. The "mere assertion of a proposal by a minority group" it observed, "does not necessarily mean that it is in the interest of the black worker, other workers or the industry."

The statement cited a proposal by a militant Pittsburgh group that "there shall be 40 percent black membership in each craft union" over the next two years and "no training program in pursuit of this objective will exceed eight months in length, irrespective of the craft."

The convention declared: "The extravagance of the percentage is self-evident. It should also be obvious that a stroke of the pen will not transform the learning process so as to graduate a qualified skilled craftsman in eight months when the existing apprenticeship system requires four years . . . we do not believe that it is in the interest of the nation, the industry or the black worker to 'take the easy way.'"

Meany said "there can be no basis for cooperation with so-called militant groups who pretend to represent these minority people, who threaten violence. Nor can the training of skilled mechanics be turned over to people who are completely without competence in this industry."

"I like the way the Building Trades are facing up to this challenge," Meany said. "I think you are on the right track.

Meany contrasted the record of labor in extending equal employment opportunities with that of banks and newspapers, and even the Nixon Administration which, with no Negroes in the Cabinet, uses the Building Trades as a "whipping boy" for reckless charges of discrimination while permitting southern school districts to put off compliance with the law after 15 years.

By unanimous vote the convention adopted resolutions calling on Appeals Court Judge Clement F. Haynsworth to withdraw his name from nomination as a Supreme Court justice, and condemning the quota system principle in the "Philadelphia Plan" as amended for the second time by the Administration.

The plan, the convention said, compels bidders on federal construction jobs costing $500,000 or more to hire a specified percentage of minority group members within certain rate ranges "on the basis of unsubstantiated statistics which appear quite erroneous." A federal official charged that several major trades have hired less than 2 percent of minority group members but a Building Trades spokesman told a Senate committee that the overall figure for all trades in Philadelphia was actually 35 per cent.

Ten department vice presidents, re-elected for two-year terms, were given the oath of obligation by Haggerty. They are Presidents Maurice A. Hutcheson of the Carpenters; Peter Fosco, Laborers; Peter T. Schoemann, Plumbers; Edward J. Leonard, Plasterers; John Lyons, Iron Workers; Russell Berg, Boilermakers; Hunter P. Wharton, Operating Engineers; Thomas F. Murphy, Bricklayers; S. Frank Raftery, Painters, and Charles Pillard, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

A major convention speaker, Under Sec. Richard C. Van Dusen of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development, noted that housing production dropped from 1.9 million units in January to 1.3 million in July and may decline to 1 million by the end of the year.

Calling on the Building Trades to provide leadership in the "fight to curb inflation and provide decent housing for all Americans," Van Dusen declared "you must all agree with me . . . that these figures" on minority employment "depict a program that is totally inadequate."

Haggerty said HUD's figures do not coincide with those compiled by the department and that the call for stepped-up employment of the new workers does not square with the recent rise in housing industry unemployment from 5 percent to 7 percent at a time when the Nixon Administration was calling a halt to much federal construction and urging states and cities to do likewise.

Other convention speakers included Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers and the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.; Pres. Maywood Boggs of the federation's Metal Trades Dept.; Pres. Michael Fox of the Railway Employes' Dept.; Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; Dir. Donald Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights; Deputy Dir. Joseph Rourke of COPE; Assistant Labor Sec. William Usery; Senators Harrison Williams (D-N.J.) and Clifford P. Case (R-N.J.).

ARCHITECTURAL DETAILS of the new National Presbyterian Church in Washington, D.C., are pointed out to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany by Dr. Edward L. R. Elson, senior minister of the church. Meany gave the address at a service of recognition and appreciation of workers who took part in the building of the church facilities.

Church Service Honors Construction Workers

Men do not work for wages alone or just for the things their labor can purchase. They work for good and great satisfaction as well, said AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany during services at the National Presbyterian Church honoring the workers who built the new facilities.

Noting that it is a rare occurrence when workers are recognized for their craftsmanship, Meany stated: "On behalf of all whose time and talent and toil went into this magnificent structure, let me say, thank you."

The new church is part of the National Presbyterian Center which is being erected on a 12-acre site in northwest Washington. When completed in 1970 it will consist of five buildings. The center dates back to the first Presbyterian church founded on the White House grounds in 1795 in a carpentry shop.

"A good mechanic takes pride in all that which his talents and craftsmanship can build," Meany said. "And you could do him no greater honor than to pay tribute to his skill, to his honest toil, to the results of his labor."

Meany recalled an earlier tribute to the men of labor with the dedication of stained glass windows at the Washington National Cathedral presented by the AFL-CIO in memory of three distinguished leaders of the labor movement.

They were, Meany said, Samuel Gompers, a Jew; William Green, a Protestant, and Philip Murray, a Catholic.

"I mention this because it serves as a reminder that in this nation, inter-religious faith and cooperation have long been characteristic of the American labor movement, as they are characteristic of so much that is good in this land.

"The bedrock upon which the American labor movement has been built is a true and abiding faith in the brotherhood and the dignity of man," Meany stressed.

He pointed out that awareness of this bond has led to joint social action programs undertaken by the church and labor "aimed at solving the massive problems of our time."

He also cited the unity of religious organizations, labor unions and civil rights groups which led to the adoption of landmark civil rights legislation of the mid-1960s.

"It was a unity that bridged political gaps—a unity which resulted in the AFL-CIO and the late Sen. Dirksen, whose funeral was held in this church but a few days ago, standing shoulder-to-shoulder in a common effort to right an ancient wrong."

Meany suggested other problems that the church-labor-civil rights organizations should face, together—"the festering slums, the neglected schools, the polluted and poisoned elements in our natural environment, all the social ills of the nation."

"Just as the church is not an assembly of those who are not already perfect, but rather who seek to be better—so the labor movement is an organization of imperfect men," he observed.

"And both the church and labor must live in an imperfect society, which is not either of our design or our making but one which we can improve."

Meany urged that both the church and labor strive to do better with continued appreciation of each other's work and contributions . . . in the "spirit that can make this a better and warmer world."

6,600 Union Craftsmen Volunteer For Hurricane Rebuilding Service

New Orleans—Hundreds of AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades union members throughout Louisiana are ready to answer the call to rebuild the scores of homes wrecked by Hurricane Camille.

In all, 6,600 union volunteers will donate their services on six weekends in the effort to house the homeless victims of the storm that ripped through the Louisiana Gulf Coast. The American Red Cross will provide the needed building materials.

The rebuilding project, which will get under way early in October, is part of the relief operations for the 69,000 families affected by the disaster.

Plans for the project are to bring 1,100 different skilled AFL-CIO building tradesmen each weekend to the devastated lower reaches of Plaquemines Parish. The volunteers will gather at marshalling centers in New Orleans—100 miles away—each Saturday morning. They will be transported with their tools on school buses provided by the parishes of New Orleans, Plaquemines and St. Bernard.

The dollar value of the services that will be donated free by the union craftsmen is expected to run into hundreds of thousands of dollars, the Red Cross estimated.

Pres. Victor Bussie of the Louisiana AFL-CIO noted that "our volunteers, all men working full-time during the week, are proud to be able to contribute to the rebuilding of family life in Plaquemines Parish."

"We want to show compassion for our fellow Louisianans in need of new housing due to Camille in the most direct way we know—by bringing our abilities to them on a voluntary basis. . . . We will provide our own tools and power equipment to do the job," he added.

In addition to the volunteer work by the union members, the Red Cross reports that large contributions continue to come in from various AFL-CIO organizations and other labor groups. Although up-to-date figures were not available, the total amount of labor contributions is estimated to be nearing the $150,000 mark.

Earlier this week in Jackson, Miss., Pres. Claude Ramsay of the Mississippi AFL-CIO presented checks to the Red Cross totalling $3,080. They were contributions from AFL-CIO local affiliates in 14 cities in Mississippi and another 11 cities in five states from Texas to Colorado.

E. V. Bighinatti, deputy national director of the Red Cross disaster services, said that "these contributions from AFL-CIO union locals . . . represent real concern for the welfare of the disaster victims, and a warm endorsement of the Red Cross."

UTU Reaches Pact to Speed Grain Loads

Cleveland—The United Transportation Union and Penn Central have signed a new agreement to help the railroad expand and speed its transportation of grain from country elevators to terminals in Indianapolis.

Terms of the six-month pact include provisions for Penn Central to establish grain-carrying mini-trains (not more than 30 cars) and run them without regard to UTU's terminal limits that govern operations of other freight trains.

Provisions for pay, work conditions and crew-size are in accord with other UTU agreements. Crews on mini-trains will provide a turnaround service and abide by instructions on deliveries, pickups and spotting of loads at terminals.

UTU Pres. Charles Luna called the agreement a "breakthrough which can ultimately create more jobs, provide better service to the public and result in more business for the railroad."

"This is an excellent example of how, through give-and-take negotiations, rail management and labor can meet the challenge of providing the type of service needed," he added.

An Epic Struggle

THERE ARE FEW STRUGGLES for social justice that can match in determination, courage and intensity of feeling the grape workers' strike now in its fifth year.

The strike and the boycott of table grapes have rallied to "la causa" clergymen, students, social welfare groups—all those who believe in the essential right of workers to organize and bargain collectively.

It has drawn the opposition of all the bitter-end conservatives who see in the struggle by farm workers—the most downtrodden and oppressed of all workers—the death knell of the free enterprise system.

In 1965, a few months after the strike started in the vineyards around Delano, Calif., the AFL-CIO met in convention in San Francisco and declared:

"The grape strikers are fighting courageously against tremendous odds, facing starvation, living like refugees in their own land, for the simple and basic right to organize and bargain collectively.

"The arrogance, the greed, the inhumanity and economic tyranny the big growers who run the factories in the field exercise over the farm workers is an old and sordid story that must be ended.

"Organized labor must help win the grape strike and make possible the first big step in organizing farm workers in California to break the agonizing grip of exploitation and poverty they are held in by the growers."

The convention pledged its full moral and financial support for as long as necessary to win the "struggle for a fuller measure of economic and social justice."

FOR FOUR YEARS the heroic strikers have held the line. They have scored victories and won recognition of their union—chartered by the AFL-CIO as the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee—from growers of wine grapes. But the battle to organize the table grape growers continues, augmented by a nationwide boycott strongly supported by the AFL-CIO and all its affiliated unions.

Over the years, as the farm workers strike gripped the imagination of socially conscious sectors of the community and won wider support, the role of the federation seemed to fade as mass media gave the trade union movement, in the words of one commentator, a "brief walk-on role."

Overlooked or forgotten in the stories about the strikers and their leaders is that the AFL-CIO and its affiliates have supplied the dollars, the manpower, the food and medicines to support the farm workers in this epic battle.

This is as it should be—the undramatic day-by-day, month-by-month work of underwriting a fight that must be made. But what must not be lost sight of is that this is a fight made by organized labor.

The courage and dedication of the grape strikers will be matched by the determination of the trade union movement that this struggle will be won, that farm workers will have the basic trade union rights that other workers have won earlier, that exploitation and oppression and terror shall be ended in the fields and groves as they have in most of the factories in the land.

A Word Edgewise:

GOP's New Theoretical Potency Founded on Unstable Notions

By John P. Roche

THERE IS AN OLD STORY about an eager young priest who urgently requested an audience with the cardinal archbishop. It was granted and at the appointed time the old prelate listened patiently as the deeply troubled curate explained that, on the basis of his reading, either St. Augustine was a heretic, or John Calvin was a Catholic. Finally, as detail piled on detail, his eminence gently interrupted: "My son," he said, "you have come to the wrong man. I just build churches and raise money. But there is a very bright monsignor you must talk to. He handles my theology."

This division of function was brought to mind by a reading of Kevin P. Phillips' "The Emerging Republican Majority" (Arlington House). Mr. Phillips is clearly the monsignor in charge of theology. He occupies an appropriate niche as special assistant to Atty. Gen. John Mitchell, Pres. Nixon's 1968 campaign manager and present top gun in GOP politics.

"The Emerging Republican Majority" attempts to demonstrate that Richard Nixon's victory last November was not just an adventitious event due to Democratic squabbling, anti-war sentiment, and public resentment over civil rights, welfare, riots, etc. Phillips' thesis has Nixon surfing on a cosmic wave, his triumph the result of basic structural changes in American society which have left the Democrats tucked away in their northeast enclave, babbling liberal incantations to an unlistening audience.

Now, as Disraeli was reputed to have remarked of Gladstone, "I don't object to the ace up his sleeve. I do object to his pretending God put it there." There is no question in my mind about how bad things are for the Democrats. And Phillips has done a remarkable job of providing Nixon and Mitchell with high theoretical justification for hunting where the ducks are—that is, for the emphasis on the "forgotten American" and the South.

But in my judgment, Phillips' major thesis just doesn't hold up. He has himself boxed in with the notion that the majority is "conservative." Which is almost as absurd as the view some of my friends have that it is "liberal."

Indeed, a strong case can be made for abolishing these categories and starting over again with, say, "greens" and "blues." But since the Republicans like to play with the conservative posture, let me put this one through the Phillips computer. Take the northern "ethnics" who were whooping it up for George Wallace back in September 1968. What happened to them on election day? Were they converted to racial brotherhood in two months? Nonsense.

A simple thing happened: the AFL-CIO organized a campaign that scared the hell out of them and they ended up voting "conservative," for what they had.

As of 1969 the old Democratic coalition is in disorganized shape, but largely because of a factor that Phillips entirely disregards: the economy. Voting Republican in the United States is a luxury item; in economic terms it is a form of living dangerously. I submit that the "conservatism" of the Irish Catholic in the $40,000 house in Westchester may be singularly correlated with the Dow Jones. If things get tough and credit gets tighter, he is not going to waste his political energy on such trivia as welfare scandals, bussing or law and order. He will set out to kill the crowd that threatens him with bankruptcy.

PARADOXICALLY THEN, conservative impulses (such as those driving our $40,000 suburban Irish Catholic or those frightening the "ethnic" workers of Lake County) generate liberal politics. The 57 percent of the electorate that backed Nixon and Wallace was enraged about a number of luxury complaints and felt it was safe to vent these aggressions.

Thus I suggest to Monsignor Phillips that Mr. Nixon is in the White House precisely because Americans do not feel threatened at the gut economic level and are willing to get some therapy at the polls. As long as they stay obsessed with their hobbies, Nixon is all right. But if they ever turn scared and conservative, we big liberal spenders will be national heroes in 10 minutes. And I suppose we shall have a bright monsignor out proving that God put the aces up our sleeve.

Affirmative Action:

Building Trades Cite Record In Recruiting Negroes for Jobs

The following is excerpted from a statement on equal employment opportunity adopted at the Building & Construction Trades Dept. convention at Atlantic City, N.J.

THE BUILDING & CONSTRUCTION Trades Dept. and its affiliates have not contented themselves with so-called passive non-discrimination programs. Whether or not legally required, the department and its affiliates have undertaken affirmative action to increase Negro employment in the building and construction trades. At its 1967 convention, the Building & Construction Trades Dept. adopted a resolution stating that it "endorses generally the principle of affirmative action to assist Negroes and other minority group persons in finding suitable employment and improving their economic and social status." In a later communication from the president of the department to the Secretary of Labor, the department proposed to implement the resolution, among other things, by fostering "with the cooperation of appropriate management organizations programs of recruitment of qualified applicants for apprenticeship from the Negro population and other minority groups."

The Kerner Commission (the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders) commended the department for its action in this regard and recommended that this commitment be intensified and implemented.

We believe this recommendation has been heeded. The Apprenticeship Outreach programs recorded a six-month high of 1,537 minority youths accepted as apprentices in the skilled trades from Jan. 1, to June 30, 1969. The total number accepted as apprentices through Outreach since the commencement of the federally funded program in 1967 is 3,862. Ninety-three percent of the total number were indentured in the building and construction trades although these trades represent 56 percent of the total registered apprentices in all industries. To get 3,862 apprentices indentured, Apprenticeship Outreach sponsors recruited 27,494 interested candidates.

Some idea of the overall improvement of the racial situation with respect to apprentices is provided by comparing the statistics of 1960 and 1968. The 1960 census statistics show that nonwhites made up 2.5 percent of the total 86,682 apprentices in the United States. In the first half of 1968 of the 26,156 apprentices newly enrolled, approximately 9.4 percent came from minority groups.

The Building & Construction Trades have not limited their efforts to apprenticeship. They have developed plans and procedures for bringing into the industry older minority workers. In July 1968, after an unsuccessful effort to secure an agreement with employer trade associations for the employment of area residents under the Model Cities program, the general presidents of the 17 national and international unions affiliated with the Building & Construction Trades Dept. adopted their own policy statement and guidelines on this subject.

Four experimental programs for the upgrading of journeymen have been initiated in Oakland, Calif.; Buffalo, N. Y.; Boston, Mass.; and St. Louis, Mo. The goals of these programs in the four cities involve the training of 365 minority workers. The federal budget for the four programs totals $968,634. Negotiations are under way for other programs in 12 of the 52 cities involved in the Outreach programs. These programs present many complex problems and are obviously in a trial and error stage.

The record of effort and concrete results, including the allocation and expenditure of millions of federal dollars, does not justify the attempt to cast the Building & Construction Trades unions in the roles of scapegoat or whipping boy for all the current ills on the racial scene. The detractors of the Building & Construction Trades unions—the sneerers and the scoffers—use a statistical device to accomplish their end. They elbow aside substantial overall ratios of Negro employment in the Building & Construction Trades by saying, "Oh, that's the laborers." They elbow aside substantial ratios of Negro employment in highly paid occupations in the building construction trades by saying, "Oh, that's the trowel trades." They confine public attention to trades such as the mechanical trades where lesser ratios of Negro participation may be attributable to higher educational requirements and other cultural factors not related to employment discrimination. They then seek to use these lesser ratios of Negro participation in particular trades as proof that the industry is "lily white."

THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. is of the considered view that the failure of the communications industry and the government to maintain an objective attitude is inflammatory and prejudicial to the sound and proper solution of the racial issue in the building and construction industry and other segments of American life. We support the right of the Negro to justice. But we cannot accept the simplistic idea that the arithmetic of a population ratio shall become the standard for selection and entry into employment in the building and construction industry.

We are convinced that the goal of increasing Negro and other minority worker participation in the building and construction trades can be accomplished with due regard to the rights of the existing organized work force. We think such an approach is preferrable to unthinking actions which tend to pit one part of the population against the other.

Unskilled Hurt Most:

Economic Slowdown Threatens Chances of Hard-Core Jobless

THE RECENT TREND toward an economic slowdown is endangering the inroads being made against hard-core unemployment, Economist Nat Goldfinger has warned.

Citing the 275,000 rise in the number of jobless workers between February and August, the AFL-CIO director of research stressed that an additional 300,000 workers turned to part-time jobs during the same period "because full-time jobs are not available."

"There is definitely a softening of job opportunities for the least skilled, the least experienced and the most vulnerable people in the economy," he declared. He pointed out that the unemployment rate among Negroes jumped from 5.7 percent in February to 6.5 percent in August.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, Goldfinger said that "the Administration seems to be embarked on an attempt to bring down the rate of price increases by going after the entire economy." This tactic, he said, "penalizes home building first—hits it hardest—and hits it fastest." He pointed out that housing starts slumped from 1.8 million at the beginning of the year to 1.3 million in July.

"The government's tight money policies and very high interest rate policy have hit housing, home building, consumer purchasing and mortgage rates," but have "hardly touched the investment boom for the big corporations, which have their own internal liquid funds—their own ways of raising money," he declared.

"THE INVESTMENT BOOM," he stressed, is the key sector of the economy "that has to be curbed and curtailed." That is the "only part of the economy that has been booming in the last year," he added, and the way to slow it is to "repeal the 7 percent . . . tax subsidy to business for investment in new equipment" and end the fast-writeoffs on new construction, "except for low- and moderate-income housing."

Reporters questioning Goldfinger were Hobart Rowen of the Washington Post and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

DISSATISFACTION has long existed over the role of the regulatory agencies that have so much influence over the quality of American life. The fact that the "regulated" so frequently have dominated the "regulators" has become increasingly evident in recent years.

This dissatisfaction, both within the agencies themselves and in the general public, has boiled over during these first months of the Nixon Administration and appears likely to keep boiling for some time to come.

There was the fight over the appointment, or rather non-appointment of Dr. John Knowles as Assistant Secretary of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare. Liberals favored him strongly. The American Medical Association denied that it prevented his appointment, but the fact remains that he didn't get the job.

There was the fight over the chairmanship of the Federal Power Commission, over the chairmanship of the Security & Exchange Commission, where charges of conflict of interest were made. The Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Trade Commission have become the center of internal bickering.

On top of all this comes news that we are now to get Dean Burch, former chairman of the Republican National Committee and active worker for Sen. Barry Goldwater in his ill-fated run for the presidency back in 1964, as chairman of the Federal Communications Commission.

In virtually every controversial appointment, the conservative, business-oriented candidate has won the blessing of the Nixon Administration rather than the public-minded candidate.

There can be little doubt that the regulatory agencies desperately need a powerful upgrading if they are to retain the confidence of the American people. The Federal Trade Commission, for example, has come in for one of the most scathing criticisms that has been expressed on a public body in many years.

A distinguished commission of the American Bar Association has just reported to Pres. Nixon that the commission's performance has been "a failure on many counts." In the bluntest kind of language, it listed a wide variety of failures in the many fields over which the FTC ranges and goes so far as to declare:

"Notwithstanding the great potential of the FTC in the field of antitrust and consumer protection, if change does not occur, there will be no substantial purpose to be served by its continued existence."

For half a century or so the FTC has been an object of criticism, but rarely has anyone suggested that perhaps it would be just as well if it were abolished and its work assigned to other agencies.

WHAT APPEARS to have happened is the surge of consumer awareness that has marked the past few years, resulting in such legislation as "truth in lending," "truth in packaging," and the appointment by Pres. Johnson of a presidential adviser on consumer affairs.

The vague, amorphous concept of the "public interest" that the regulatory agencies have supposedly guarded over the years, has become the "consumer" a far more personal entity which has a voice that it is using more and more.

Today the press, and notably the labor press, is filled with "consumer news" that day after day reveals the relationship between the regulatory agencies and the commercial world and what happens to the people's pockets as a result of that relationship. No longer can the regulatory agencies operate in an abstract world that all too frequently boils down to a cozy relationship between themselves and the people they are supposed to be regulating.

It is becoming increasingly clear that the regulatory agencies must be reformed, that they must become far more sensitive than they ever have been to the interest of the American consumer which means the "public" in its most direct meaning.

THE RECENT TREND toward an economic slowdown poses a threat to the inroads now being made against hard-core unemployment, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger, center, said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Hobart Rowen, left, of the Washington Post and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine. The public affairs program is heard Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Sky Chefs Pact Covers 5,000 At 30 Airports

Cincinnati — A card check among nearly 5,000 employes of Sky Chefs, Inc., brought recognition of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes and improved wages and working conditions in a first contract at 30 airport restaurants and food commissaries.

Union members ratified the new pact at local union meetings in 20 geographical areas, including Hawaii. It went into effect with the signatures of Union Pres. Ed S. Miller and Robert J. Caverly, company board chairman.

Some of the employes had been union members covered by contract but most were not.

The new pact, culminating a 10-month organizing campaign by the union staff, embodies a national system-wide agreement with Sky Chefs, an American Airlines subsidiary operating hotels, motels, coffee shops, restaurants and airport catering services for airline passengers.

The company extended recognition to the union after cards had been checked by Lawrence Seibel, Washington, D. C. arbitrator, at company headquarters in New York City. Final negotiations were attended by member Leverett Edwards of the National Mediation Board.

The new contract includes wage rates higher than those in any proceeding agreement, and fringe benefit improvements including health and welfare coverage, according to the parties.

Miller said the successful outcome of the organizing drive and the negotiations "represents a new and greater advance in bringing union benefits to the fast-growing air travel service industry."

Consumer Department Seen as No Cure-All

A federal Dept. of Consumer Affairs would give the American consumer "Cabinet status" but structure alone is not enough, Mrs. Esther Peterson said in testimony before the House subcommittee on executive and legislative reorganization.

Mrs. Peterson, who was special assistant to Pres. Johnson for consumer affairs, is Washington legislative representative for the Clothing Workers. She testified for herself and added that the union "concurs with my testimony."

Congratulating the sponsors of bills to create a consumer department for their "far-reaching proposal," Mrs. Peterson said that over the years she has participated in debate over whether such a cabinet-level department is what the consumer needs.

"Frankly, I think there are good arguments on both sides of the question," she testified. "There is nothing in the present organization of the President's Committee to prevent it from accomplishing the aims" of the proposed bill.

Mrs. Peterson said she is "delighted that Pres. Nixon has apparently decided to maintain the office" of consumer affairs "and has appointed a dynamic, knowledgeable lady to fill the post"—Mrs. Virginia Knauer, who has been "making some excellent speeches and has taken some significant legislative stands."

"But I am afraid," she declared, that Mrs. Knauer will discover that "Knauer Power," like "Furness Power" for Betty Furness or "Peterson Power" is directly dependent on the support of the President and others around him.

The present structure, "if adequately backed by statutory authority, funds and staff, could be effective," but "structure alone cannot assure an effective program," she asserted.

Mrs. Peterson said she doubts that a single department "could withstand the combined opposition of the powerful economic forces which could be marshaled against it."

More could be accomplished by "well-administered programs in different agencies coordinated by a single office with statutory mandate and a will to do the job," she advised.

Besides, she said, "the consumer can't wait for a major administrative reorganization to solve his problems. He needs help now."

Whatever the final form, the consumer office needs its own staff of top attorneys and field representatives and top economists, she said. She also voiced the hope that when Congress makes a final decision, it "calls for a Senate-confirmed presidential appointee to head this office and an advisory board with the emphasis on consumer representation."

To Ease Disruptions:

Bargaining Urged In Campus Unrest

Students and college administrators should use the techniques of collective bargaining to bring about needed change on the campus, AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis suggested.

Davis told a conference of student government leaders and college presidents that union members have been "turned off" by the "irrational and destructive" tactics of campus extremists.

"The fight for change" must be made "within the democratic process," Davis said at a conference sponsored by the Association of Student Governments.

He stressed that the labor movement will continue to press for improvements in higher education—both in terms of making colleges more responsive to a fast-changing society and in the expansion of higher education to make it available to all who have the capacity to absorb it without regard to ability to pay.

"Just as the system of collective bargaining has worked in the labor-management field, I think it can work when disputes arise between students and college administrators," Davis said.

A necessary first step, he emphasized, is to strengthen representative student organizations, such as student governments, "both in status on campus and in membership" so that the majority viewpoint on campus will be represented.

Many union members have a direct interest in what is happening in the colleges, Davis noted, because they have sacrificed and struggled to help their children get a college education. "They did not contemplate training tomorrow's revolutionaries."

Concerned Over 'Backlash'

Labor is also concerned, Davis said, because the "backlash" from disruption on and off the campus "has moved this country to the right" and threatens the interests of workers and the poor.

Isolation of the "hard-core revolutionaries" doesn't mean a placid campus, Davis stressed. It "does not preclude peaceful demonstrations and it won't halt all campus disruptions." But maximum use of the democratic and political process "can achieve real change faster than burning down the ghetto or closing down the university."

The AFL-CIO, he noted, favors lowering the voting age to 18 "so that young people can share in the shaping of public policy."

Davis spoke to the conference about "black studies" programs with the insight of a black trade union educator as well as an AFL-CIO spokesman.

The key, he said, is whether to view black studies as "an educational program or a forum for ideological indoctrination."

The Questions

He asked: "Is it a means to achieve psychological identity and strength, or is it intended to provide a false and sheltered sense of security, the fragility of which would be revealed by even the slightest exposure to reality? And finally, does it offer the possibility for better racial understanding, or is it a regression to racial separatism?"

Davis urged an understanding of the "pains and pressures experienced by the black college student" including feelings of guilt over breaking away from a ghetto environment, frustration in dealing with white people and institutions, the "brutal academic competition" with students who were given a better preparation for it, all added to "the turmoil of a period of life that is trying under the best circumstances."

He told the conference that black studies programs are desirable "so long as they are not viewed as a substitute for a college career which will prepare the student for the real world—a world that offers great challenges and great opportunities."

As for the AFL-CIO, he said, it will continue to battle for greater educational opportunities for all Americans and an increased federal investment in the schooling of the American people—including higher education.

Congress Asked to Save Public Health Hospitals

Maritime labor and management leaders have asked Congress to aid them in a battle to maintain what's left of a network of Public Health Service hospitals.

At issue is the recent closing of PHS hospitals in Detroit and Savannah, Ga. Their shutdown leaves only eight PHS hospitals in a system that contained 23 in 1949.

The maritime industry has a special interest in maintaining the hospital system because it was originally established by Congress —more than 170 years ago—to provide medical and surgical care for merchant seamen.

However, O. William Moody, Jr., administrator of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. urged a Senate Labor & Education subcommittee to intervene not just on behalf of seamen.

Moody, who also testified for the Seafarers, said, "While maintaining the priority given to our members by Congress, we are recommending that PHS hospitals be given a new and enlarged role in providing medical care."

"It is almost incomprehensible," he declared, "that at a time when the health and hospital needs of this country are so apparent—that an arm of the federal government would be taking out of service these essential facilities."

Co-directors Earl Clark and Hoyt Haddock of the Labor-Management Maritime Committee also appealed to the subcommittee and other members of Congress to help keep the hospitals open. Haddock is executive director of the AFL-CIO Maritime Committee.

In response to the testimony, Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.), subcommittee chairman, instructed his staff to send telegrams to the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare and the Budget Bureau demanding "immediate reopening" of the Detroit and Savannah hospitals.

"This question," he said, "has broadened out beyond the merchant seamen to concern of the whole nation. . . . This should be a time for expanding public health facilities, not curtailing them."

Shultz Names New Chief of Standards Unit

George C. Guenther, deputy secretary of the Pennsylvania Dept. of Labor & Industry since 1967, has been named by Sec. of Labor George P. Schultz as head of the Bureau of Labor Standards.

The bureau develops and enforces standards prohibiting potentially dangerous child labor, and unsafe conditions in shipyard and longshore industries, and assists states and organizations working to improve labor legislation.

A native of Reading, Pa., Guenther was credited with bringing about a number of changes in the Pennsylvania department, including reorganization of its Bureaus of Inspection and Workmen's Compensation.

Guenther, 38, was president of the John H. Guenther Hosiery Co. in Reading prior to joining the Pennsylvania government. He holds a bachelor of arts degree in psychology from Amherst College.

Per Capita Tax Raised At Colorado Convention

Denver—Delegates to the eighth biennial convention of the Colorado AFL-CIO here increased per capita payments to the state central labor body from 20 to 22 cents a month and eliminated a full-time position.

The convention re-elected Pres. Herrick S. Roth and Sec.-Treas. A. Toffoli by acclamation. Of 27 vice presidents, 16 were re-elected and 11 were elected for the first time.

The post eliminated was that of executive vice president, held since 1956 by R. C. Anderson, who had announced his retirement. Anderson was named executive vice president-emeritus.

The convention acted on more than 50 resolutions dealing with national, state and trade union issues. Among these was a resolution supporting the balancing of racial and ethnic enrollments in the Denver public schools.

The delegates commended the building trades unions for their programs of pre-apprentice training among minority groups in Colorado Springs and Pueblo. They also urged expansion of union leadership and staff opportunities for Negroes and Mexican-Americans.

Among other actions, the convention authorized several new administrative positions in the federation and pledged to strengthen its support of COPE.

Major speakers included Pres. A. F. Grospiron of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, Pres. John J. Pilch of the Typographical Union, Vice Pres. Sol Chaikin of the Ladies' Garment Workers, Lt. Gov. Mark Hogan, Representatives Frank E. Evans (D-Colo.) and Donald G. Brotzman (R-Colo.), and Pres. Tony DeChant of the National Farmers Union.

Addresses also were delivered by representatives of four other state federations—Pres. H. S. Hank Brown of the Texas AFL-CIO, Sec.-Treas. E. J. Jacobs of the Arkansas AFL-CIO, Executive Sec. John D. Holoday of the Wyoming AFL-CIO and Gordon Flory of the Louisiana AFL-CIO.

Pill Makers Profit:

Drug 'Name Game' Costs Consumers

Drug manufacturers continue to play a "name game" that reaps them exhorbitant profits at the public's expense, declares Richard Shoemaker, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

The game is one through which manufacturers market and promote their drugs under individual brand names even though many of these brands share a common generic name—the name that applies to all drugs of the same chemical composition.

This and recent price-fixing convictions in the industry demonstrate its "callous indifference to human life," Shoemaker writes in the September issue of the American Federationist.

He points out that most physicians prescribe by brand names and the consumer pays the brand name price which is "anywhere from two to 10 times as much as another chemically identical drug available by the generic name."

If doctors had prescribed drugs by generic names, he emphasizes, the $3.2 billion that the public spent on prescription drugs in 1967 "would have been hundreds of millions of dollars less."

A Task Force on Prescription Drugs, set up by Pres. Johnson, estimated in its 1969 report that potential savings to the consumer if generic drugs were prescribed would amount to 5 to 8 percent.

But this estimate is based only on drugs most frequently prescribed, the article notes. A combination of more rational as well as generic prescribing on all drugs would increase the savings to about 20 percent, it adds.

This "exploitation of the public" is mainly the fault of the drug makers, not the doctors, Shoemaker suggests, since the doctors generally have no choice except to prescribe by the highly promoted brand names.

Although the importance of generic prescribing is usually related to reducing drug costs, "a case can also be made for generic prescribing as a method of improving the quality of care and of reducing drug-induced illness," Shoemaker states.

Pharmacologists (physicians who spend all their time in the study of drugs) "admit they can't keep up with the outpouring of brand products"—now numbered at 20,000—so "obviously the practicing physicians cannot."

And, he continues, similarities in the spelling and sound of brand names leads to confusion in hastily telephoned or scribbled prescriptions. "As a result, nurses and pharmacists make many mistakes in administering drugs, sometimes with tragic results."

Shoemaker also asserts that the system by which a manufacturer subjects doctors to heavy sales pitches and publicity buildups without mentioning price "makes price-rigging a little easier."

He recalls a federal court conviction last December of Charles Pfizer & Co., American Cyanamid Co. and Bristol-Myers Co. on charges of patent fraud and criminal conspiracy to monopolize the antibiotic market in the United States. Two other firms, Upjohn Co. and Squibb Beech-Nut were named as co-conspirators.

As a result, the federal government, states, cities and private groups filed liability claims against the companies. The suits were settled under an agreement in which the firms pledged $100 million to satisfy claims.

Shoemaker proposes implementation of the recommendations of the Task Force on Prescription Drugs and an amendment to the Food & Drug Act to permit the Food & Drug Administration to evaluate the relative effectiveness of drugs used to treat the same disease.

The task force called for a number of actions to expand information on drugs, including one that would blunt the brand name promotions: The Social Security Administration would undertake "continuing responsibility" to survey drug prices and publish information on them generically.

Noting that the AFL-CIO Executive Council last year characterized the drug industry as "socially irresponsible," Shoemaker concludes, "There is no new evidence to change that verdict."

SYMBOL OF UNITY in the trade union movement is portrayed by this gathering at the dedication of a United Farm Workers headquarters building in Delano, Calif. The new structure was named for the late Roy Reuther, who assisted the UFWOC in early organizing drives. Among those participating in the ceremonies were, from left, Bernardi De Juzmen, consul general of the Philippines; Larry Itliong, UFWOC assistant director, Dir. Cesar Chavez; Pres. Harry Van Arsdale of the New York City Central Labor Council; UFWOC Vice Pres. Dolores Huerta, and AFL-CIO Regional Dir. William Gilbert of Los Angeles.

Farm Workers Win $2-Hour Grape Pact

Delano, Calif.—The United Farm Workers negotiated a two-year contract renewal with A. Perelli-Minetti & Sons to raise the basic minimum wage for grape pickers to $2 an hour.

The new pact, retroactive to May 1, boosts hourly wages 29 cents from the $1.71 an hour level of previous contract. Workers will receive an additional 15 cents an hour, including incentive rates, next May 1.

Another key provision in the agreement prohibits the use in the vineyards of certain chemicals that are hazardous to the health and safety of the workers. The four pesticides banned by the agreement are DDT, Aldrin, Dieldrin and Endrin.

Additional economic improvements include provisions for jury duty pay, bereavement pay and vacations. The contract also provides for checkoff of union dues and credit union payments and sets up a comprehensive grievance and arbitration system to cover on-the-job disputes.

Perelli-Minetti is a major wine grape grower and processor of wine products and spirits.

$2.25 Top Scale

Besides the basic $2 minimum, the pact calls for payment of $2.05 an hour to irrigators and $2.20 to tractor drivers. Night differential payments add another 5 cents to the wages in both categories. The rate for pipeline repair is also 5 cents more an hour above the $2 minimum.

Dir. William L. Kircher of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization hailed the contract as "another milestone" in the march by farm workers toward full collective bargaining in agriculture.

Kircher noted that UFWOC's action in limiting the use of pesticides will serve the interests of the consuming public as well as the health of the harvesters.

Agreement on the contract was reached after four months of negotiations. The union's bargaining team was headed by UFWOC Vice Pres. Dolores Huerta and Irwin DeShelter of the AFL-CIO. They were assisted by a union committee of Apolinar Ahedo, Carmen Robledo and Dario Jimenez.

ILO Receives Award For Aid to Disabled

Dublin, Ireland—The International Labor Organization was honored for its work in vocational rehabilitation by the International Society for the Rehabilitation of the Disabled at the conclusion of its 11th World Congress here.

The presentation of one of the society's Albert Lasker Awards cited the ILO for "championing the rights of the handicapped worker . . . and promoting the initiation and improvement of vocational rehabilitation programs" throughout the world.

Bill to Relax Antitrust Law For Papers Hit

The AFL-CIO opposed the "failing newspaper act" as "more a newspaper enrichment bill than a newspaper preservation bill."

Associate Gen. Counsel Thomas E. Harris told a House Judiciary subcommittee that by giving newspapers partial exemption from the antitrust laws, the bill would work to the detriment of both reader and advertiser.

He pointed out that the measure contains no requirement that an allegedly failing newspaper must seek a purchaser other than a competitor and added that "the lubricant of profit pooling is likely to mute ideological clash."

He cited the growing tendency for newspaper owners to acquire radio and television affiliates and asked:

"Is there any reason why a newspaper which is jointly owned with a profitable television operation should be given a special exemption from the antitrust laws on the ground that, viewed alone, the paper is inadequately profitable? We see none." Nor, he added, should there be "any special antitrust exemption for the weaker units in a profitable newspaper chain."

Citing the partial exemption from antitrust prohibitions against price fixing of rail carriers and insurance, Harris said, "they had at least the justification that the exempted industries were subject to regulation.

"No such justification exists for authorizing competing newspapers to fix prices, divide the market, and pool profits; and we do not believe that the supposed justification of preserving diversity withstands analysis."

Woodworkers to Act On Constitution Change

St. Paul, Minn.—A major constitutional overhaul and financing of new and expanded programs were voted by delegates to the 26th constitutional convention of the Woodworkers.

The 315 delegates re-elected Pres. Ronald F. Roley and Sec.-Treas. William Botkin, along with H. Landon Ladd, of Toronto, as second vice president and Alex Archibald, New Westminster, B.C., for a six-year term as trustee. They were unopposed.

Referendum balloting by some 110,000 members of the IWA in the United States and Canada will begin next week to elect the first vice president. Candidates are Keith Johnson, who has served the past two years as second vice president, and L. C. Miller, president of a local union in Longview, Wash. The incumbent first vice president, Claude Ballard, will retire within a few weeks.

A 12-member committee representing all sections of the international union was set up to conduct a broad study and recommend changes in the IWA constitution for action at the 1971 convention in Kansas City, Mo. No major changes have been made in the constitution since 1959.

The convention also scheduled a referendum vote by Apr. 1, 1970, on an increase in per capita payments to the international union. Amount of the increase will be set by the executive board on the basis of new and expanded programs.

In line with Roley's keynote address to the convention, other speakers stressed the need for adjustment of the labor movement to changes in society and technology, the importance of understanding younger workers and involving them in union affairs, greater work in political action, and the responsibility of members to provide the financing necessary for a progressive program.

Speakers included Pres. Peter Bommarito of the Rubber Workers; William Kircher, AFL-CIO director of organization; Joseph MacKenzie, organizing director of the Canadian Labor Congress; AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Carl Winn; and former IWA Pres. A. F. Hartung.

Resolutions adopted by the convention included strong opposition to Senate confirmation of Judge Clement Haynsworth as a Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court.

The resolution noted Haynsworth's "consistently hostile" record toward the labor movement and minority groups, along with the conflict of interest in the Deering Milliken textile labor case.

Other resolutions dealt with housing and high interest on mortgages, income tax reform, a 50 percent increase in social security, work toward formation of a single union in the Forest Products Industry, endorsement of specific legislation in conservation and air and water pollution, and reaffirmation of support for the United Nations in achieving world peace.

Two Unionists Advisers On Minority Enterprise

Pres. Nixon has appointed two labor representatives to the Advisory Council for Minority Enterprise for the U.S. Dept. of Commerce.

Joining the 63-member council are Pres. C. L. Dellums of the Sleeping Car Porters and Dir. Donald S. Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights.

Labor Presents Case for Tax Justice

Summary of statement by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany before the Senate Finance Committee on the Tax Reform Act of 1969, presented Sept. 22, 1969.

The 13.5 million members of the unions of the AFL-CIO are, almost without exception, taxpayers. They pay their taxes regularly, payday after payday, through the payroll withholding program. They are loyal Americans; they appreciate the value of government, the services of government, the need for paying for government.

They are willing to pay their fair share.

But they are tired of having to pay the share of other Americans. Specifically, they are tired of paying the share of those Americans whose incomes are greater and whose taxes are lower—the "loophole set" in today's society.

So it is on behalf of the largest organized group of taxpayers in America that the AFL-CIO appears here today as advocates of tax justice. We don't have tax justice today and will not achieve it under the House bill. And the Administration's proposals bear no resemblance at all to tax justice.

The federal tax system is rigged against those whose livelihood comes from the work they do. It is rigged in favor of those whose income results from investments.

This unfair rigging results from the fact that a triple standard is applied to income taxed by the federal government.

The Unfair Triple Standard

One standard applies to wages, salaries, and other forms of so-called ordinary income. This income is taxed in full and, for workers, the tax is regularly deducted from their paychecks.

A second standard applies to income from stocks, real estate, and other so-called capital assets sold at a profit. Only half of such income is taxed. And under present law the tax can never be more than 25 percent —even for those in the very top tax brackets.

A third standard is applied to certain forms of income which never even appear on the tax form, such as the interest on state and local bonds, or the income that is washed out by phantom, nonexistent costs as oil depletion, fast depreciation write-offs, and bookkeeping farm losses. This type of income completely escapes taxation.

The wealthier you are, the greater are the opportunities to take advantage of these preferentially taxed or untaxed forms of income.

This triple standard will not be ended through reforms that eliminate or curb some relatively obscure tax dodges affecting a handful of people. Nor will it be ended merely by ensuring that those of extreme wealth and ability-to-pay are called upon to make some contributions to the federal Treasury.

The now infamous 21 persons, for example, who paid no taxes at all on their incomes of $1 million and over, have become a symbol. And, I fear, too many have addressed themselves only to this symbol. Tax measures to ensure that those with astronomically high incomes merely pay some taxes to the federal government fall far short of tax justice.

Justice can only come when:

- The impoverished are completely removed from the tax rolls.
- There is a meaningful reduction in the relative tax burdens of low and middle-income families.
- The loopholes of special tax privilege for wealthy families and businesses are eliminated.

The single most costly loophole and the one that is the prime culprit of unfairness is the capital-gains loophole.

Treasury Loses $10 Billion Annually

This is not a loophole which applies only to a handful. It is not a loophole which reduces anyone's taxes to zero. And its effect on the tax structure does not give rise to tax-evasion horror stories that can be dramatically illustrated through the media.

Yet, because of the half-tax on capital gains and the zero-tax on such gains passed on at death, some $30-40 billion escapes the tax base, resulting in an annual Treasury revenue loss of over $10 billion.

And it is a tax preference that says, in effect, the more wealth and income you have, the more opportunities you should be allowed to avoid a fair share of taxes.

The AFL-CIO has continually pointed to this loophole as the major flaw in the tax system. The Treasury study published last February confirms this, saying that the special treatment accorded capital gains is the "most important factor in reducing the tax rates of those with high incomes."

We see no justice to a tax provision which says that a married taxpayer with $8,000 in capital-gains income should pay a tax of $354 while a married taxpayer, with the same amount of wage income, should pay $1,000.

We also recommend taxation of the $15 billion in capital gains that is passed on annually to heirs without even being mentioned on the income-tax form.

Under the House action, some of the capital-gains loopholes would be trimmed. The House would eliminate the 25 percent maximum and would extend the holding period for long-term capital gains from six months to one year.

Even with these improvements, capital gains would still remain as the prime factor in eroding the fairness of the tax structure, for unearned income would still be preferentially taxed. And, what is worse the Administration has proposed to weaken even these modest reforms.

If the tax structure is to meet America's standards of fair play, loophole closing must be broad-gauged and substantial. On April 1, 1969, before the House Ways & Means Committee, the AFL-CIO presented a program which we believe would achieve tax justice—a program which would generate some $15-17 billion in federal revenues from substantial loophole-closing, provide relief to those of low and moderate and middle incomes, and allow some $8-10 billion to fully fund existing federal programs geared to meeting domestic needs.

Against that background, we think the House bill merits commendation, for:

1. The working poor are relieved of any federal tax obligation.

2. The hard-working, tax-paying low-and middle-income Americans, who have been forced to bear far more than their just share of the tax burden, have been given a modicum of relief.

3. The single most inflationary pressure in the economy, the 7 percent investment credit to business, has been eliminated.

4. Some of the loopholes and gimmicks in the tax structure, designed to provide special, unfair tax bonanzas for the very wealthy, have been trimmed, although not eliminated.

Improvements in House Bill Urged

We urge the Senate to improve upon the House action and to reject all proposals, including those of the Administration, which would move the tax structure still further away from America's standards of fair play.

Specifically, we urge the Senate to:

1. Close the capital-gains loophole, ending the major tax preference for unearned income.

There cannot be tax justice as long as unearned income is half-taxed while earned income is taxed in full.

The modest changes recommended by the House are welcome but not enough and the Administration would largely undo the positive action taken by the House.

2. Put an end to the tax abuses of the oil, gas and other mineral industries.

Again the measures taken by the House are welcome ones. They would reduce the depletion allowance, eliminate depletion on foreign oil and gas wells, place a limit on the amount of exploration expenses that can be immediately written off, and end some other abuses such as the carved-out production payment.

End Tax Abuses of Gas & Oil Industry

Nevertheless, of the total revenue that escapes taxation due to the activities of these industries, only one-third would be recovered by the House action.

We recommend the complete elimination of these abuses.

3. Eliminate the maximum-tax provision.

Under the maximum-tax provision contained in the House bill the top tax rate on earned income would be 50 percent.

This proposal would benefit only those with incomes above $50,000.

It would serve to provide an uncalled-for tax bonanza of $100 million to top corporate executives, doctors, lawyers and others whose income comes from astronomically high fees and salaries.

The Administration has strongly endorsed this proposal. It reflects a cynical philosophy that if taxes on the wealthy are cut, they won't try so hard to find loopholes. Such a philosophy makes a mockery of tax-reform efforts. We cannot subscribe to it and we strongly condemn it.

4. Strengthen the minimum-tax provisions of the House bill.

The so-called Limit on Tax Preferences (LTP) proposed by the House and the weaker version offered by the Administration are prime examples of reforms addressed solely to symbols.

Both the House and the Administration versions would limit the amount of certain types of income that can be completely tax-exempt to no more than half of total income plus $10,000. Thus, the more the income you have, the more can be tax-free.

What's more, if you fail to shelter all your income in one year, you can keep trying for another five.

Under the House bill, though a wealthy individual affected by the LTP would by no means pay his fair share of taxes, he would pay some.

Under the Administration proposals, since state and local bond interest would not be recognized as income under the LTP, some wealthy individuals would still escape scot-free and pay no taxes at all.

The AFL-CIO has proposed a 25 percent minimum tax on exempt income in excess of $10,000 for individuals and $25,000 for corporations—regardless of the amount of the taxpayer's ordinary income.

5. Strengthen and improve other measures contained in the House bill.

For example:

- Interest on state and local bonds should be taxed in full with the federal government guaranteeing the bonds and providing an interest subsidy to ensure that the fiscal powers of the state and local governments are not damaged.
- Instead of the hobby farm loophole-closing proposals suggested by the House and the Administration, the loss-limit approach contained in S. 500 should be adopted. This procedure was recommended by Sen. Lee Metcalf and endorsed by a bipartisan group of 26 senators. This approach is specifically tailored to the tax-loss farmer and ensures that legitimate farm operators will not be penalized.
- The income-averaging formula should not be liberalized to include capital gains unless the preferential treatment accorded such gains is eliminated.
- Interest deductions on bonds used to finance corporate mergers and acquisitions should be completely disallowed.
- All rapid depreciation on real estate should be disallowed, except for low- and moderate-income housing.
- Accelerated depreciation on regulated utilities should not be allowed unless the tax benefits flow through to the consumer.

Finally, the Senate should provide more substantive relief to those whose incomes are moderate and whose tax burdens are unnecessarily severe.

Tax relief and justice do not necessarily go hand-in-hand. The equity in the tax structure can be as badly damaged by tax cuts as it can by tax increases or the addition of new loopholes and gimmicks.

Under the House-passed bill this concept was partially recognized. Though all groups would receive relief, a significant proportion of the relief would flow to low- and middle-income taxpayers.

Under the changes proposed by the Administration needed relief for those just above the government-defined poverty threshold and those in the middle-income brackets would be cut back, the state-gasoline-tax deduction would be disallowed, and a tax cut would be given to corporations.

Other Changes Recommended

Under the House proposals, $4 billion in tax relief is provided through the low income allowance and standard deduction increases. These primarily benefit low and middle income taxpayers. Another $4.5 billion is granted through across-the-board rate cuts. Over half of this relief goes to taxpayers with incomes of $15,000 or over.

The Administration agrees with the House on cutting the taxes of the wealthy, but says it goes too far when it would cut taxes for those of low and modest incomes. In addition, claims the Treasury, corporate taxes should be cut $1.6 billion.

We endorse the House proposals to increase the low-income allowance to a flat $1,100. In addition, we endorse the House proposals to increase the standard deduction to 15 percent and $2,000.

We do not agree with the general rate reductions recommended by the House and the Administration; and certainly there is no justification for a reduction in corporate taxes.

Instead we recommend a reduction in the tax rates that apply to the first $8,000 of everyone's taxable income for married individuals and the first $4,000 for single individuals.

Our relief proposals would result in the same revenue loss as that proposed by the House. They would cost roughly $600 million more than proposed by the Administration—an amount that could easily be made up by, for example, eliminating the maximum-tax provision, effectively closing the hobby-farm gimmick, and adopting a meaningful minimum tax.

Mr. Chairman, we urge that this committee bring the federal income tax into line with what it's supposed to do—tax income in accordance with ability-to-pay. That's tax justice.

Says He's 'Sorry' About That:

dence that Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell, Judiciary Committee Chairman James O. Eastland (D-Miss.) and Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) "are colluding to whitewash Judge Haynsworth instead of conducting a fair and open-minded inquiry."

Published reports indicate that Thurmond and the Administration viewed the Brunswick revelation as a possible turning point in the case —to the extent that they persuaded Michigan Sen. Robert P. Griffin to fill a Republican vacancy on the Judiciary Committee, even though he preferred to bid for a Finance Committee opening.

If Griffin had not exercised his seniority to claim the spot, it might have gone to New York Sen. Charles E. Goodell, considered by Thurmond to be too liberal to swallow the Haynsworth nomination.

Ironically, it was Griffin who led the fight against confirmation of Abe Fortas as Chief Justice on grounds that many observers have termed considerably flimsier than the case against Haynsworth.

Griffin acknowledged that he had discussed the Haynsworth nomination with the attorney general but asserted that it was "too cynical" an interpretation to assert that he was put on the committee only to vote for the nomination.

Later, after hearing Haynsworth testify, Griffin expressed some of the misgivings that a number of Republican senators have been voicing both on and off the record. He suggested to Haynsworth during the hearings that the judge perhaps hadn't been a "strict constructionist" in interpreting the American Bar Association's canon of ethics.

Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) tried, as have others, to get Haynsworth to reconcile his extensive stock investments with Canon 26, part of the code of ethics for judges, which says clearly that judges shouldn't make investments in firms apt to be involved in litigation and should dispose of any such investments made before they were appointed to the bench.

Haynsworth insisted that the code was only "meant to deal with the problem of a small court depending on a single judge." He cited as an example "a trial court that has jurisdiction in one county, and a bus company in that county is in his court every term of court he has, and he owns stock in that bus line, so that he cannot sit, and the court breaks down because he cannot function." In such a case, said Haynsworth, "as a judge, of course he should dispose of his stock . . . this is the problem the canon is concerned about."

It was the apparent indifference of Haynsworth to the appearances of impropriety, as contrasted with actual violation of any law, which brought expressions of concern from several committee members.

On the Deering Milliken case, where Haynsworth did not disclose that a firm in which he was an officer and major stockholder did $100,000-a-year business with Deering Milliken textile mills, Sen. Bayh asked Haynsworth:

"If you had to do it over again, would you still maintain that kind of relationship with Carolina Vend-A-Matic?"

Did the judge really feel, Bayh asked, that there was "absolutely nothing" that was improper in his business relationship while serving as a judge?

"I don't know what you mean by that kind of relationship," Haynsworth replied. "I was a stockholder as I have said."

Bayh spelled it out: "Stockholder, vice president, and your wife was secretary and you were on the board of directors and you owned $450,000 worth of stock. You are doing business with one of the litigants."

A colleague of Haynsworth on the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals was brought to testify on behalf of the Haynsworth nomination and to discuss the handling of the Brunswick case.

The witness, Judge Harrison L. Winter, told the court that the case had been substantially decided before Haynsworth bought the stock and therefore did not pose a conflict of interest. But under questioning, he said that he would not himself have made such a stock purchase.

During Haynsworth's second appearance on the stand, he explained how he ended up with stock in the Mortgage Guarantee Insurance Corp., which enriched insiders some years back because of its sharp rise in value.

Haynsworth said he had originally invested in 1,000 shares of a firm organized by Sen. Ernest F. Hollings (D-S.C.), who earlier testified he had recommended Haynsworth to Pres. Nixon as a Supreme Court possibility. The Hollings firm was subsequently acquired by Mortgage Guarantee in an exchange of stock.

Haynsworth Asked to Withdraw As Nominee for Supreme Court

Atlantic City—Delegates to the 55th convention of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. called on Judge Clement F. Haynsworth to request that his name be withdrawn from consideration as a nominee for associate justice of the Supreme Court. If he does not do so, the Senate should vote not to confirm him, the convention urged.

The delegates voted to join Federation Pres. George Meany in declaring that Haynsworth, a member of the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in South Carolina, "is not fit" to be a high court justice.

The call for Haynsworth to withdraw was based on his indication that he would be willing to take that action "if there was substantial doubt concerning his acceptability."

The convention listed these compelling reasons for Haynsworth's withdrawal:

- Occupancy of the bench of the highest U.S. court "should be restricted to individuals whose integrity and standards of professional ethics are above reproach" and beyond doubt.
- "Documented testimony" before the Senate Judiciary Committee provides reason for "substantial doubt whether Judge Haynsworth meets these requirements."

Meany told the committee that Haynsworth "did not maintain ethical standards above reproach while on the bench"—specifically in the Deering Milliken case "in which ample case law, squarely on point, should have persuaded —indeed, compelled—" the judge to disqualify himself.

The convention directed that copies of the resolution be sent to each Senate member with the request that each senator vote against confirmation if the issue reaches the floor.

Meanwhile, appeals to reject the nomination of Haynsworth were being sent to the Senate by AFL-CIO affiliates and their leaders from all across the nation.

They emphasize that the Senate should refuse to confirm the South Carolina judge for his lack of concern over legal codes against conflict of interest and because of anti-labor and anti-civil rights bias.

A resolution adopted by the Transport Workers convention in Florida, sent to Pres. Nixon and members of the Senate Judiciary Committee, described Haynsworth's record as reflecting "utter insensitivity to the needs and feelings of workers and minority groups."

He "has admitted to associations," the resolution continued, "which are more blatant conflicts of interest than those which forced another Supreme Court justice to resign."

The Woodworkers convention, meeting in St. Paul, Minn., attacked Haynsworth's tie-breaking vote in a ruling that Deering Milliken workers had no claim to back pay or jobs after the firm shut down a plant when employes voted for a union.

By not removing himself from the case when he was a major stockholder and director in a vending machine firm doing business with Deering Milliken, the Woodworkers said, Haynsworth was guilty of a "flagrant violation of codes of legal ethics."

The convention's resolution urged Nixon "to select as future court nominees individuals without bias against any segment of our society."

The Amalgamated Transit Union's convention in New York sent a resolution to all senators urging them to vote against the Haynsworth nomination if it comes out of committee.

Confirmation "would not be in the public interest," the union said, since it would cause the people to have doubts about the integrity of a court with a justice who has "a double standard of ethics."

Resolutions condemning the nomination and calling for its rejection also were adopted by a number of state and local AFL-CIO bodies.

A letter from Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes, sent to every senator, concluded that Haynsworth's confirmation "would result in giant steps backward for the nation."

Urging opposition to confirmation, Wurf charged Haynsworth with "a lack of sympathy for basic constitutional rights of minority groups and total insensitivity" to rules governing conflict of interest.

Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers described Haynsworth's financial dealings as "at best shady—at worst dishonest." A "cloud of suspicion" hangs over the judge's head and it has not been cleared away, Beirne declared.

FAST, EFFICIENT mass transit systems "are imperative" to solving other urban problems, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told the Transit Union convention in New York. Looking on are ATU Pres. John M. Elliott, center, and Sec.-Treas. James J. Hill.

Rise in Prices Slowed, Buying Power Still Lags

Consumer prices rose less sharply in August than in recent months, but the real wages of rank-and-file workers' paychecks continued to buy less than last year, the Labor Dept. reported.

The Consumer Price Index climbed by four-tenths of 1 percent to 128.7, meaning that it cost $12.87 in August to buy goods and services that cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period.

Arnold Chase, assistant commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, said he was "encouraged" that the rate of increase was not going up. The CPI jumped by five-tenths of 1 percent in July, and by six-tenths in June.

Chase emphasized, however, that he was not drawing any conclusions from a drop in the rate of increase. "It's quite possible we may have some smaller increases in the coming months, but we might get some larger ones," he added.

Gross average weekly earnings of production and non-supervisory workers rose by 61 cents in August to a new high of $116.43, due entirely to a two-tenths of an hour increase in the workweek. Average hourly earnings were unchanged at $3.04.

Weekly take-home pay for the worker with three dependents rose to $101.38, a gain of 46 cents. The increase for the worker with no dependents was 44 cents to $92.29.

When expressed in 1957-59 dollars to adjust for price changes, the take-home pay was $78.77 for the worker with three dependents and $71.71 for the worker with no dependents, virtually unchanged from July.

However, these real spendable earnings represented a decline of 22 cents since August 1968 for the worker with three dependents and essentially no change over the year for the worker with no dependents.

Chase pointed out that the August index for all items was 5.6 percent above a year ago. So far this year, prices have risen by 4 percent compared to the increase of 3.1 percent in the first eight months of 1968.

As in other recent months, the price increase in August resulted "mostly from higher prices for services and food," BLS said.

Costs of consumer services went up by seven-tenths of 1 percent, led by "significant" increases for mortgage interest, property taxes, home gas and electricity rates, and home repair services.

Medical care services continued an unrelenting climb. Chase said this index was led by a 1.2 percent increase in hospital care charges—the largest spurt in the last five months.

Housing costs advanced by six-tenths of 1 percent with home-owner costs up nine-tenths of 1 percent. Rent costs, four-tenths of 1 percent higher, posted their largest monthly increase since July 1956.

An increase of six-tenths of 1 percent in the food index in August was led by a sharp rise in egg prices, resulting from lower supplies. Meat prices were up except for beef. Fruits and vegetables were lower priced but the decline was less than seasonal.

Cigarette prices posted their third successive monthly increase in the wake of earlier wholesale increases. Other commodities which led to the August price rise included alcoholic beverages, gasoline and housekeeping supplies.

Approximately 155,000 workers will receive cost-of-living pay boosts based on the August CPI. About 79,000 of them, mainly in aerospace, will receive 8-cent hourly increases; another 25,000 workers, also primarily in aerospace, will get 5-cent an hour increases. About 36,200 workers in tobacco, aerospace and chemical industries will get increases ranging from 1 to 3 cents an hour. About 14,300 in various industries will receive raises ranging from 4 to 11 cents.

Debs Award Goes To H. E. Gilbert

Terre Haute, Ind.—A national commitment "to achieving the dreams" of Eugene V. Debs was urged here by the recipient of an annual award honoring the memory of the one-time railroad labor and Socialist leader.

H. E. Gilbert, assistant president of the United Transportation Union, reminded a dinner attended by 500 persons that even today—a half century after his death—Deb's goals of peace, social justice and brotherhood remain unfulfilled.

The 1969 Debs Foundation citation extolled Gilbert as a "labor statesman" and singled out his role in helping to fulfill a goal of Debs —unity among the railroad operating unions.

Gilbert for many years headed the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, the union in which Debs was once secretary and editor of its magazine. The Firemen are now part of the UTU which also includes the former Trainmen, Conductors and Switchmen.

Senate Weighs Bill:

Labor Renews Call For 'Tax Justice'

testifying before the Finance Committee sought to widen loopholes for special interest business groups.

Several conservative committee members tried—without success—to persuade Meany that closing of tax loopholes would discourage investment in job-creating enterprises and thus hurt workers.

The AFL-CIO president retorted that people will still invest money where it can earn a profit. The American economic system, he suggested, isn't so fragile that it must depend on a "rigged" tax system that requires a worker earning $8,000 a year to pay nearly three times as much in taxes as an investor whose $8,000 income comes from "capital gains" investment profit.

"We see no justice" in such a provision, Meany said.

Every year, he reminded the committee, the federal government loses more than $10 billion because of untaxed capital gains.

Under the House-passed bill, "some of the capital gains loopholes would be trimmed" but "unearned income would still be preferentially taxed," Meany noted. "What is worse," he added, is that "the Administration has proposed to weaken even these modest reforms."

Meany urged the Senate to close the capital gains loophole completely, end fully the oil depletion allowance, and eliminate the 50 percent ceiling on taxation imposed by the House.

The maximum tax provision "would benefit only those with incomes above $50,000," Meany noted. "It reflects a cynical philosophy that if taxes on the wealthy are cut, they won't try so hard to find loopholes. Such a philosophy makes a mockery of tax reform efforts."

Meany acknowledged that city and state governments are helped by being able to sell their bonds at lower interest because the interest is tax-exempt.

But he said the AFL-CIO's proposal that the federal government guarantee the bonds and pay an interest subsidy would serve the same purpose and bring in more money in federal income tax than would be paid out in subsidies.

The AFL-CIO president also suggested a realignment of the income tax reductions contained in the House bill by lowering the tax rate 1 percent in each of the first five income tax brackets.

Every taxpayer would benefit—but the dollar reduction would be the same for the man making $8,000 a year as for the man with a taxable income of $100,000. Each would receive a $130 reduction. Under the House bill, the $8,000 man would receive an $80 cut and the $100,000 man would pay $3,600 less than he does now.

Delay Fought

While committee hearings continued, a tug-of-war with political overtones has been going on over the scheduling of Senate floor action on the tax bill.

Republicans, with some conservative Democratic support, have sought to put the tax bill over until next year—when the strong public demand which forced House action on tax reform this year may have diminished.

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield has been insisting that the Senate Finance Committee clear legislation for floor action by Oct. 31—the date Committee Chairman Russell B. Long (D-La.) had accepted as a deadline.

In what was considered a move to reduce pressure for action on tax legislation this year, the conservative-dominated committee separated repeal of the 7 percent investment tax credit from the overall reform bill and voted to clear it for floor action.

But Mansfield said he will stand by the position taken by the Democratic Policy Committee and insist that tax reform be considered as a single package.

A recent Harris poll found that more than four out of five Americans are concerned about tax justice. Eighty-three percent of those questioned in a nationwide survey thought that the rich are able to use tax loopholes to avoid paying their full taxes, 10 percent weren't sure, and only 7 percent thought the rich were fairly taxed.

In answer to another question, 62 percent said they would feel better about paying their own taxes if the tax loopholes were closed.

Colorado University Appoints Thornbury

Boulder, Colo. — Kenneth F. Thornbury, research director of the Rubber Workers for the past three years, has been named assistant director of labor research at the University of Colorado Center for Labor Education & Research. Thornbury has been associated with the labor movement since joining the old Oil Workers International Union in 1936.

'... And One Step Backward'

Nixon Names Panel On Business Taxes

Pres. Nixon has named a business-dominated commission, headed by one of his former law partners, to study whether the present corporate tax structure may be too harsh on business.

One of the alternatives it will consider will be the value-added tax, which has been described as a national sales tax in that it is passed on to the consumer.

The commission will be headed by John H. Alexander, the tax specialist in Nixon's old law firm. Roger Milliken, president of the Deering Milliken textile chain, will serve on the commission. A New York Times story declared that "virtually all" the commission members "could be described as conservatives and almost all have long been on the record with opinions that the current level of taxes borne directly by corporations is too high."

Manufacturing Profits Climb 6% in Quarter

American manufacturers made more money during the second quarter of 1969 than they did during the same period the year before.

Their after-tax profits of $8.9 billion in the April-June period were 6 percent higher than the previous year and before-tax profits were 5 percent higher.

The latest quarterly report on profits from the Federal Trade Commission and the Securities & Exchange Commission shows that manufacturers made a before-tax profit of 8.9 cents per dollar of sales. That's up from the 8.6 cents for the first quarter, but down from the 9.3 cents for the second quarter of 1968.

Companies paid out $3.8 billion in dividends during the April-June period and retained $5.1 billion. Both figures were above the 1968 level.

Among durable goods producers, before-tax profits were up 3 percent from a year earlier. There were big gains by the lumber and wood products industry.

Earnings of nondurable manufacturers were up 7 percent before taxes, including a 27 percent increase for the apparel industry and a 21 percent jump in profits for drug manufacturers.

Sales by manufacturing companies increased 10 percent above the same three months of 1968 and were up 8 percent over the first quarter of 1969.

now allowed only to low-income families living in privately-built apartments. The individual or family pays 25 percent of income for rent and the government pays the balance.

- A higher ceiling on the amount the government will pay for public housing construction in high-cost areas.

Unless the ceiling is raised, the Senate was told, thousands of housing units scheduled for construction will never get built.

- Federal payment of some project maintenance costs which now must be met by rental income.
- Significant expansion of the amount of money authorized for nearly all phases of federally-assisted housing in order to meet the long-range goals of the 1968 Housing Act.

A last-minute amendment by Sen. John G. Tower (R-Tex.) added to the housing bill a provision that labor warned could become an anti-union tool.

It directed the Secretary of Housing & Urban Development to insist that there be "no inhibition by contract or practice" against building techniques, work methods or use of materials which would lower costs. The amendment, pointedly aimed at union work rules, was somewhat softened with the words "to the extent feasible."

Nevertheless, the AFL-CIO warned, the Tower amendment threatens to "bring chaos to the building industry and destroy work rules that protect rights of workers and employers in free collective bargaining."

Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) described it as a "blunderbuss approach."

He noted that building trades unions have cooperated in projects throughout the country in developing technological breakthroughs that lower the cost of housing construction.

But the Tower Amendment, Proxmire charged, would make the HUD secretary "a construction czar with the power to dictate the detailed terms of contracts to thousands of locals."

With many senators off the floor at the time, the amendment was adopted by voice vote and a fight to delete it will shift to the House.

A bipartisan "anti-hunger coalition" of 38 Democrats and 16 Republicans rebuffed both the Nixon Administration and the Senate Agriculture Committee by expanding the food stamp program and liberalizing eligibility.

Minor changes in the original proposal of Sen. George S. McGovern (D-S.D.) helped win broad support and a 54-40 vote substituting the coalition bill for the Agriculture Committee version. Final passage was by a one-sided 78-14 margin.

The AFL-CIO had testified for similar legislation at Senate hearings earlier this year and labor legislative representatives worked to win votes for the measure—while Agriculture Dept. spokesmen were buttonholing Republican senators urging them to stick with the committee bill.

Principle features of the Senate-passed bill include:

- A raise in the authorization ceiling for the food stamp program to $1.25 billion this fiscal year, $2 billion the following year and $2.5 billion for fiscal 1972. The committee bill would have set the limit at $750 million this year and $1.5 billion for the next two years.
- Free food stamps for families with incomes under $60 a month. A family of four would receive stamps worth $125 at the checkout counter.
- Eligibility of any family of four with an income of under $4,000 to buy food stamps at a cost not exceeding 25 percent of the family's income.

Other significant reforms include eligibility without a demeaning investigation, permission for poorer families to buy less than their full allotment of stamps, expansion of stamp purchases to include soap and other sanitary products, and deduction of food stamp costs from welfare checks.

Non-profit agencies or the federal government were authorized to operate food stamp programs in cities and counties that refuse to set up a program.

Opponents warned that the House would never go along with such a liberal food stamp program, but a last-minute move to recommit the bill to the Senate Agriculture Committee was beaten, 56-39.

Meany Pledges No Retreat In Struggle for Social Gains

Executive Council Report:

Decade of 1970s 'Crucial' to Labor

Atlantic City—The AFL-CIO has moved forward vigorously in the past two years in all areas affecting American workers, the AFL-CIO Executive Council reported to the federation's eighth constitutional convention.

But there is a whole series of new challenges and needs and problems facing the labor movement as it enters the 1970s, the council declared, and the convention's decisions will help chart the course "in the crucial period before us."

The 29-member council reviewed the two-year period since the last convention in a 384-page report covering all of the activities of the AFL-CIO, decisions taken and the shape of continuing and new problems facing the country and its trade union members.

Highlighted by reports from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, the council document covers developments in the labor movement, the national economy, international relations, social security and welfare, urban affairs, education, community service, civil rights, labor and the law, national and state legislation, political activities and reports by the headquarters departments and trade and industrial union departments.

Reviewing the victories of the past two years in terms of gains for American workers, Meany said that "what we have is not good enough; America needs much more."

He reaffirmed his faith in the American political and economic systems declaring that "America

Nixon Backs Direct Vote For President

Pres. Nixon for the first time gave an unqualified endorsement to a proposed constitutional amendment to abolish the Electoral College and allow the American people to elect their President by direct, popular vote.

The House has already approved the direct election amendment by well over the required two-thirds majority, and Nixon's statement of support gave a big push to the Senate to do likewise.

Approval by two-thirds of the Senate would send the amendment to the states for ratification. Three-fourths of the states—38 of the 50—must approve it before it becomes part of the Constitution.

Earlier, Nixon had said he personally prefers direct election of the President but doubted that it could win ratification. Therefore he urged Congress to initiate a constitutional amendment that would divide a state's electoral

Hits Threat To Jobs, Cut In Programs

By Saul Miller

Atlantic City—The Administration's economic and legislative policies are threatening to bring on serious unemployment and are critically reducing important economic and social programs, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the federation's eighth convention here.

In a wide-ranging keynote speech to the opening session of the convention, Meany reviewed the events of the past two years, the developments in Washington in the past nine months and declared:

"We intend to stay in business, we do not propose to accept the proposition that the working people of this country no longer merit full and fair consideration in the resolution of all issues affecting them, and that includes all the pressing issues of the day—tax reform, interest rates, inflation, urban problems, education, civil rights, the whole works."

He told the approximately 900 delegates in the Traymore Hotel convention hall that "no organization in America" other than the AFL-CIO "encompasses such a broad range of commitments and no other organization pursues these commitments with a greater responsibility and consideration for the welfare of the nation as a whole."

But while the nation and the labor movement have come a long way, Meany asserted "we still have a long way to go." He spoke of poverty, the problems of the cities, the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King and Sen. Robert F. Kennedy and of the continuing

Withdrawal Urged:

Protests Mounting In Haynsworth Case

A new wave of opposition to the nomination of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., to the Supreme Court surfaced on Capitol Hill as two Republican senators said publicly what others are reported to have told Pres. Nixon privately—that he should withdraw the nomination.

Sen. Edward W. Brooke, the only Negro in the Senate, publicly urged Pres. Nixon to withdraw Haynsworth's nomination. Brooke said he based his opposition on Haynsworth's civil rights decisions and his business dealings.

"If there is a consensus in the Senate at the moment," Brooke said, "I think it is the view that Judge Haynsworth is not the distinguished jurist whom the country expected to be nominated." Brooke asked Nixon to withdraw the nomination to prevent embarrassment of the Republicans in the Senate.

Sen. Ralph T. Smith (R-Ill.), recently named to replace the late Everett M. Dirksen, also announced his opposition to the Haynsworth nomination.

"At a time our courts have difficulty, I do not think the nomination would be advisable," he told the White House.

Published reports also said that new Senate Minority Whip Robert P. Griffin asked Nixon at a leadership meeting to withdraw the nomination because several Republicans were uneasy over it.

A spokesman for Griffin said he would not comment because the Senator considers any conversation he had with the President "private." Griffin led last year's GOP fight to block the nomination of Abe Fortas as Chief Justice.

As the Senate Judiciary Committee announced a delay of at least one week in voting on the nomination, Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) said he was getting the "runaround"

Social Security Raise 'Far Short' of Need

The Nixon Administration's proposal to increase social security benefits by only 10 percent next April 1 falls far short of what is needed, the AFL-CIO said, because the "proposed increase will not even permit beneficiaries to eke ahead in the losing battle they have been fighting with the cost of living."

AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman said the opposition to the Nixon proposal was based on the consumer price index, which rose 8.1 percent between February 1968, when social security benefits were last raised, and August 1969.

Another 4 percent increase in this index is a reasonable expectation by April 1970, Seidman said, so a 10 percent increase would mean that "social security beneficiaries will remain once again the nation's most tragic victims of rising living costs."

The recommendation which Nixon sent to Congress includes a provision to adjust benefits automatically in the future in accordance with increases in the consumer price index, Seidman noted. "But even if the rise in living cost is matched in percentage terms with increases in benefits, the economic status of most of the elderly will be one of dire need," he stressed.

"Without major improvements in the benefit structure before adoption of the cost of living escalator clause, there is danger of condemning the majority of social security beneficiaries to perpetual, substandard living conditions," the statement said.

Lockout Threatened By Railroad Owners

All but one of the nation's railroads threatened to shut down all service to the public and lock out their employes if rail shopcraft unions go ahead with a scheduled strike against six of the nation's 75 major railroads.

The unions saw the move—by management's National Railway Labor Conference—as a device to force government intervention by creating a "national emergency" justifying a court injunction.

Shopcraft unions, which have set an Oct. 4 strike date, are the Machinists, Sheet Metal Workers, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Boilermakers—all acting jointly—plus the Firemen & Oilers and the Railway Carmen, which negotiate separately.

A day after management announced its lockout threat, the Penn Central Railroad—the nation's largest—backed out of the management ultimatum.

The Penn Central was not a target of the strike action and Board Chairman Stuart Saunders announced that the railroad would continue to operate if other lines are struck.

The unions have been trying for

Metal Trades Forge Organizing Campaign

Atlantic City—A vigorous campaign to organize every worker in the jurisdiction of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. and its 22 affiliated unions was voted by delegates to the department's 54th convention.

"Organization is absolutely necessary, not only to our growth but also to our survival," Pres. Maywood Boggs said in his first convention report as presiding officer. He took office three months ago as successor to B. A. Gritta, who resigned and was named president-emeritus.

During a two-day period the convention welcomed into membership the Elevator Constructors, a new department affiliate; voted full cooperation in a Naval shipyard campaign by the Cooperative Committee on Organizing Federal Employes and the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization; mandated a similar drive in private industry and called for uniform rules of procedure and responsibility for all affiliated Metal Trades councils.

Boggs reported that, for the first time, the department has representatives on both the East and West coasts to better serve its local councils.

A major problem is a "vicious raiding campaign" by an unaffiliated organization at the Norfolk, Va., Naval Shipyard, where the department represents 7,600 workers.

The department will, he said, continue to press for a federal shipbuilding program in the Navy and Merchant Marine.

Boggs announced that the Metal Trades Dept. and the new AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center are planning a seminar on collective bargaining for unions which represent federal employes.

Convention speakers included AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers and the Maritime Trades Dept., Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept., and representatives of the Labor Dept., Army, Navy, Maritime Administration, Atomic Energy Commission, Civil Service Commission and the Shipbuilders' Council of America.

The convention adopted reports:

- Approving continued cooperation with the AFL-CIO on radiation standards adopted by the Labor Dept. to protect uranium miners.
- Expressing strong opposition to any interference by government agencies in the administration of joint apprenticeship training programs, and any efforts to "discriminate because of race, creed or nationality."
- Opposing "emasculation" of the U.S. Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training and the loss of the appropriations it needs to perform its duties adequately.

A major report said "the department will not tolerate the breakdown of craft skills through the watering-down of regulations for beginning apprentices."

It "adheres to the principle that no on-the-job training program which involves an apprenticeable trade should be sponsored" by the Labor Dept. "without prior approval of the union involved."

The delegates approved reports calling for revising the format and contents of the department's Monthly Bulletin; recommending expansion of research and legislative services; endorsing a 35-hour week in federal service without reduction in pay, and effective federal standards, "with meaningful penalties" for violation of occupational safety and health regulations.

Meany told the convention that "if inflation continues, the drive for higher wages is going to continue because we expect to move forward and not stand still."

William J. Usery, assistant secretary of labor, predicted that public employe unions will continue to grow as the demand for their services increases.

Hall urged the metal trades to "keep pressing" for an independent maritime agency and a massive program to build more ships in U.S. yards—ships flying the American flag, manned by U.S. crews and carrying more American cargoes.

Membership Grows In Credit Unions

Madison, Wis.—Labor unions in the United States now own and operate 1,044 credit unions with more than 600,000 members, according to CUNA International, formerly the Credit Union National Association.

The non-profit service organization also reported that the total number of credit unions in the nation increased by 510 to 23,053 in the year ended last Dec. 31.

CUNA's 1969 yearbook shows that total membership in U.S. credit unions rose from just over 19 million to 20.2 million and savings from $11.1 billion to $12.2 billion. Total assets climbed from $12.7 billion to $14.1 billion.

In Canada, the number of credit unions decreased by 101 to 4,663, but their membership rose by about 600,000 to 5.1 million. Savings increased from $2.9 billion to $3.2 billion and total assets went up $3.3 billion to $3.7 billion.

Abel's Leadership Praised:

IUD Convention Votes Funds For Organizing, Bargaining

By Eugene A. Kelly

Atlantic City—The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. voted new two-year terms for its top officers at the department's eighth convention and doubled its per capita tax to finance an intensified program of organizing, coordinated bargaining and contract analysis.

Delegates from 61 unions affiliated for 5.7 million members unanimously elected Pres. I. W. Abel for his first full term.

They approved five changes in the IUD constitution, including an increase in per capita payments of affiliated unions from 2 cents a month per member to 4 cents. And they adopted a series of policy statements for the guidance of the president, 24 vice presidents and the two IUD operating heads—Organizational Dir. Nicholas Zonarich and Administrative Dir. Jacob Clayman.

The convention expressed its "deep gratitude" to Abel for "leading the department out of its darkest depths to the threshold of its greatest achievements."

The convention tribute to Abel, who also is president of the Steelworkers, noted that "less than two years ago the IUD was in trouble. The only leadership it had ever known had suddenly departed. Its treasury was depleted and much of its staff dispersed."

Since Abel agreed to accept the presidency, the resolution noted, "judicious management has balanced the financial books. Department services have been restored," within financial limits. "Modest beginnings have been made on new programs."

The statement said "a quiet redemption of this kind makes few headlines but its ultimate significance to the labor movement . . . can hardly be exaggerated."

In opening the convention as presiding officer, Abel was strongly applauded when he pledged that IUD will "continue as a strong and respectable part of the AFL-CIO" and "never forget that we are an arm of the AFL-CIO." As members of a team, "we will function as part of that team," he promised.

Abel called on the delegates to "make common cause with all . . . who seek social and economic justice." This is, he emphasized, "a time to join hands —to re-cement the political and social coalition" between labor, the minorities, family farmers and the liberal and intellectual community.

The delegates elected Pres. Floyd E. Smith of the Machinists as a vice president replacing P. L. Siemiller, retired, and Pres. Thomas E. Boyle of the Chemical Workers as a vice president to succeed the late ICWU Pres. Walter L. Mitchell. All other board members were reelected.

Abel emphasized the IUD's interest in working conditions by naming a new IUD Committee on Safety & Health to follow through on department programs. Members are Presidents Peter Bommarito of the Rubber Workers, A. F. Grospiron of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, William Pollock of the Textile Workers Union of America, Harry D. Sayre of the Papermakers & Paperworkers, Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers, Smith of the IAM and Steelworkers' Vice Pres. Joseph P. Molony.

Major policy resolutions:

- Supported strikes of the Farm Workers against California grape growers; of the Cement Workers against Universal Atlas Cement Co., a subsidiary of the U.S. Steel Corp., and newspaper unions against Hearst's Los Angeles Herald-Examiner.
- Urged that a broad national health insurance system be financed from federal funds, and that unions negotiate more prepaid health care plans.
- Called on every union in the IUD to "redouble" its COPE efforts in 1969 and 1970.

The convention asked Congress to pass the Williams-O'Hara Occupational Safety & Health bill setting national standards; urged all-out union involvement in the war against pollution; and asked adoption of a new welfare system and coverage of the working poor by a wage-hour law with a $2.50-an-hour minimum wage.

Rail Owners Threaten To Halt All Services

nearly a year to negotiate wages on a level with those of union members in the six crafts outside the rail shops. They charged that they have been stymied by the refusal of management to meet since June, and the built-in delays of the Railway Labor Act.

To break the deadlock, four unions set 12:01 a.m. Oct. 4 as a strike deadline after the National Mediation Board halted its efforts at arbitration. The unions selected six railway companies to avoid any appearance of a national emergency, and then offered to resume talks with Labor Sec. George P. Shultz as mediator.

When the employers voted to shut down all roads rather than negotiate, Machinists Vice Pres. William Winpisinger told newsmen at Atlantic City for the AFL-CIO convention that management in effect told Shultz to "go to hell."

It seems clear, Winpisinger commented, that "the industry must have refused the secretary's invitation for more negotiations before the strike deadline."

He said that, when Shultz called union negotiators to Washington last weekend, the labor men said "we are ready for more negotiations" to settle the long dispute.

The unions still plan to walk out Oct. 4 unless Pres. Nixon names a special emergency board, as the employers have been urging him to do. After that, if the dispute is still not resolved, "we'll strike at the end" of the 60-day "cooling-off period," the IAM negotiator said.

The unions say skilled workers in rail shops are being paid at the rate of $3.59 an hour when comparable craft skills draw 50 cents to $1.50 an hour more from other employers.

They are asking wage hikes of 10 percent the first year of a new contract; an additional hike for skilled workers, shift premiums and a cost-of-living escalator clause tied to prices.

The railroads on which strike dates were set are the Santa Fe, Great Northern, Chesapeake & Ohio-Baltimore & Ohio, Southern, Illinois Central and the Erie-Lackawanna.

Title on the Door No Substitute For Overtime Pay, AFL-CIO Says

A title on the door may get you a rug on the floor. But unless it means more money in the paycheck, you're not an executive, the AFL-CIO maintained in a statement to the Labor Dept.

The Labor Dept. is currently reviewing the salary test it applies to "executives" and "professionals" to determine if they are exempt from overtime pay requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

At present—under regulations last changed in 1963—no one making less than $100 a week, regardless of his supervisory responsibilities, is exempt from the wage-hour law as an "executive."

And no one making less than $115 a week can be excluded as a professional.

Persons making above that amount aren't necessarily excluded. They have to meet job description tests that demonstrate that their principal work is supervision or that they meet the definition of professional.

Even if they do, of course, they can still be paid overtime under union contract requirements or by agreement of the employer. But the employer isn't required by law to pay the time-and-one-half rate.

The Labor Dept. agrees that no real executive these days is paid as little as $100 a week, nor are professionals hired at $115.

So it has proposed raising the pay requirement to $130 for executives and $150 for professionals.

That's still too low, the AFL-CIO told the department's Wage & Hour and Public Contracts Divisions.

In a 12-page submission, the federation documented its argument that the lowest level that should be set to exempt supervisors from the legal requirement for overtime pay is $150 a week, and the minimum standard for professionals should be $175.

It noted that the average nonsupervisory production worker in manufacturing makes more than $129 a week. Even a $150 wage cutoff for supervisors would be a differential of only 17 percent, and much smaller for establishments where wages are above average.

Likewise, it said, even starting rates for professionals with no experience these days average above $175 a week, with the average for experienced employes much higher.

Convention Urges Action:

Nixon Reminded Of Maritime Vow

By Duane Emme

Atlantic City—Demands that Pres. Nixon live up to a pledge "to rejuvenate America's merchant marine" dominated the eighth constitutional convention of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

Wide-ranging programs adopted by the delegates, representing 7.5 million workers in 42 unions, showed the deep concern of seafarers and shipbuilders about the nation's critical problems.

The first action taken by the convention, presided over by MTD Pres. Paul Hall, was the unanimous adoption of a resolution voicing "unremitting opposition" to the nomination of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., to the Supreme Court.

A report of the MTD executive board, adopted by the delegates, expressed optimism that a long period of erosion in the merchant fleet would be ended on the basis of "specific and definite" commitment by Nixon.

The report pointed out that Nixon had promised during his campaign to advance a program aimed at a sharp increase in the percentage of U.S. commerce carried in American vessels. The present rate is about 5.6 percent; Nixon said the rate should be at least 30 percent.

Noting that the United States has slipped to 11th place among nations in shipbuilding, the board said the Administration "has promised a program designed to turn this tide by tripling current shipbuilding levels in the United States."

However, the board observed that the Administration's program, promised for mid-year, has still not been sent to Congress.

That set the stage for what followed as speaker after speaker—leaders in labor, the maritime industry and Congress—served notice on the Administration that its merchant marine program was overdue.

Rep. Edward A. Garmatz (D-Md.), chairman of the House Merchant Marine Committee, said "We still are getting word from Administration leaders that its program is coming. But the target date keeps getting pushed back, and back, and back."

Congress will not wait much longer without producing its own program, Garmatz said. "The will of Congress to act is clear . . . the honeymoon is over."

Sen. Charles E. Goodell (R-N.Y.) made it clear that he too was "looking forward" to Nixon's proposals "with great anticipation." It's time to move "from rhetoric to reality in rebuilding our fleet," he added.

Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) said "The sad statistics of deterioration and decay that plague American shipping are a blot on the pride of a seagoing nation."

The Administration "has promised an ambitious maritime program," Williams declared, "and now the country waits and waits for action to back up the promise."

Sen. Joseph M. Montoya (D-N.M.) and Rep. James M. Howard (D-N.J.) both hit sharply at the loopholes through which big American corporations escape taxation by registering and crewing their ships abroad.

Montoya said that "closing foreign tax-credit shelters is crucial to the growth and prosperity" of the merchant marine, and Howard expressed regret that withdrawal of tax exemption from runaway shipping was not in the House-passed tax bill.

A comprehensive maritime program endorsed by the convention called for increased subsidies for shipping, aid to U.S. shipbuilders, steps to maximize the use of American vessels in hauling cargoes and an end to the government's "unreasonable reliance" on ships under foreign flags.

"These ships escape U.S. taxes, wages and safety standards," the convention pointed out, "and are then rewarded for running away from the American flag . . . with favored treatment by the Defense Dept."

The resolution on Haynsworth deplored his "appalling lack of ethical judgment . . . in failing to insulate his judicial affairs from his financial affairs."

Haynsworth also is unqualified, the resolution said, because his rulings have demonstrated "a lack of sensitivity to the basic rights of working men and women and the basic rights" of Negroes.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the convention that Haynsworth "has not displayed the ethical standards that the American people have the right to expect from a person sitting on the Supreme Court."

Aberrant Rulings

The judge's decisions, Meany said, show that he is "completely out of line" with the attitude of the nation as a whole on labor-management relations and civil rights issues.

He charged the Administration with "trying to make a whipping boy out of the building trades, and very unjustly" by trying to impose hiring quotas on them while backing down on civil rights progress in other areas.

The Administration is "promoting delay" in integration of southern schools that was ordered by the Supreme Court more than 15 years ago, Meany said, "because this is what the southern allies of the Administration are interested in."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland praised maritime unions for the "solid, unfailing support" that they always have given to the federation's programs and policies.

In turn, he added, the AFL-CIO supports such department programs as "the revival of a strong merchant marine, the promotion and protection of our fishing industries, and the full development of the untapped resources of the oceans."

The convention adopted an extensive resolution deploring mounting "invasions of privacy" that are being used against the American people by government and employers, and demanded measures to halt the spread of "prying and spying."

The delegates dealt with a wide variety of domestic issues—calling for congressional passage of the AFL-CIO's "tax justice" proposals; advancements in civil rights; and programs to provide more housing and education and eliminate poverty and hunger.

THE RIGHT TO VOTE in presidential elections should be granted to the 2.7 million American citizens living in Puerto Rico, the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. declared in a resolution adopted by its convention in Atlantic City. Delegates acted after hearing an address by Puerto Rico Gov. Luis A. Ferre.

Chairmen Listed For 8th Convention

Atlantic City—The following is a list of committee chairmen for the AFL-CIO's eighth convention here:

Resolutions—Vice Pres. I. W. Abel, president, Steelworkers.

Constitution — Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, president, Communications Workers.

Education — Vice Pres. Peter T. Schoemann, president, Plumbers & Pipe Fitters.

State and Local Bodies—Vice Pres. Lee W. Minton, president, Glass Bottle Blowers.

Credentials — Vice Pres. David Sullivan, president, Service Employes.

Rules—Vice Pres. Richard F. Walsh, president, Theatrical Stage Employes.

Executive Council Report—Herman D. Kenin, president, Musicians.

Label—Vice Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, president, Clothing Workers.

Appeals—Vice Pres. Hunter P. Wharton, president, Operating Engineers.

Bargaining Law Sought For Public Employes

Atlantic City—A federal law to spell out organizing and bargaining rights for employes of state, county and municipal governments has been called for by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

The proposal was recommended in a report on "collective bargaining in the public sector" submitted to and approved by delegates to the department's eighth constitutional convention.

The report is based on a study authorized by the department's executive board in February 1968 and made by a 12-member committee headed by Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes.

The study reached two major conclusions about unionism and bargaining among workers in state and local governments:

- They work "without any protective legislation in the turbulent 1960s—an era when governments, caught up in crises beyond their understanding, enact repressive laws based on incomplete and irrational theories."
- A hodge-podge of state laws reveals the "urgent need" for a federal law "with minimum standards, to give broad and systematic legitimacy to the public employes cause."

In another area, the report urged repeal of restrictions against the right of public employes to strike except in cases "where the public health and safety would be endangered."

It emphasized that the harsh punishments called for in no-strike laws for public employes "have not deterred public employes from withholding their services" and, in fact, have increased tensions and antagonisms.

The report also urged enactment of a labor relations law for federal employes—similar to the National Labor Relations Act — to govern bargaining and provide machinery for resolving impasses in federal labor-management relations.

It supported legislation to that effect introduced in Congress by Sen. Gale W. McGee (D-Wyo.) and Rep. Thaddeus J. Dulski (D-N.Y.). The measure is supported by the AFL-CIO.

Study Committee

Members of the department's study committee in addition to Wurtz were Pres. Howard Coughlin, Office & Professional Employes; and the following union counsels: Lester Asher, Cement Workers; David S. Barr, Painters; Jon Flinker, Retail Clerks; Ed J. Hickey, Fire Fighters; Isadore Katz, United Textile Workers; C. V. Koons, Communications Workers; Martin F. O'Donoghue, Plumbers & Pipe Fitters; Louis P. Poulton, Machinists; Francis X. Ward, Carpenters; and Henry T. Wilson, Laborers.

Democrats Take Over Another GOP District

The election of 32-year-old Michael J. Harrington to Congress in Massachusetts has brought the Democratic net gain in 1969 special elections to three seats, virtually wiping out the four-seat gain made by the GOP in the 1968 general elections.

Harrington, a state legislator who had labor backing, defeated William L. Saltonstall for the 6th district seat in Massachusetts left vacant by the death of Republican William H. Bates.

Unofficial complete returns gave Harrington 72,030 votes to 65,453 for Saltonstall with 60 percent of those eligible voting, an exceptionally high turnout. Harrington is the first Democrat in nearly 100 years to hold the seat.

Harrington joins Reps. John Melcher of Montana and David Obey of Wisconsin in taking over a seat previously held by a Republican. Melcher won the race in Montana to replace conservative James F. Battin, who accepted a federal judgeship, and Obey won the Wisconsin seat vacated when Melvin Laird became Secretary of Defense.

A fourth Democrat who had labor backing, Ed Jones in Tennessee, won a congressional seat in 1969, but it was to replace a Democrat who died.

Harrington's election gives the Democrats a 244-188 edge in the House. There are three vacancies, two in Illinois and one in New Jersey.

The Republicans had 192 seats at the start of the 91st Congress, which is four more than they now have. However, one of those four is the vacancy created in Illinois when Donald Rumsfeld resigned to become director of the Office of Economic Opportunity.

Another labor-supported candidate got past a primary hurdle in Cleveland when Mayor Carl B. Stokes won the Democratic nomination by a 31,000-vote margin. Stokes, the first Negro elected mayor of a major U.S. city, will face Republican Ralph Perk in November.

Musicians Announce Staff Appointments

New York—Larry McDonnell, a Musicians representative for the northwestern United States and Canada, has been named an assistant to Musicians' Pres. Herman D. Kenin.

Kenin also announced two other appointments: Jerry Zilbert, a business agent for AFM's Local 360 in Renton, Wash., was chosen to fill the post vacated by McDonnell. George Sartick, secretary of the union's Local 42 in Racine, Wis., was named representative for AFM's Upper Midwest region, succeeding George Buttkus, who has retired.

COPE Endorses Holton in Virginia

Richmond — Virginians were urged to vote a split ticket in elections this fall as the State AFL-CIO threw its support behind Republican A. Linwood Holton for governor.

Delegates to the state COPE convention also endorsed Democrats J. Sargeant Reynolds for lieutenant governor and Andrew P. Miller for attorney general.

In stressing the values of the two-party system, the resolution pointed out that the state labor body's endorsement does not constitute backing of the Republican party, nor "does it constitute endorsement of the Nixon Administration." Holton faces Democrat William C. Battle in the gubernatorial race.

Providence College Honors NLRB Member

Providence, R.I.—John H. Fanning, a member of the National Labor Relations Board, has been awarded an honorary degree by Providence College. Fanning, a member of the NLRB since 1957, was awarded a Doctor of Public Administration at the college's 50th anniversary convocation.

TRIBUTE to the late editor of the Electrical Workers' Journal, Marie Downey, was given by IBEW Vice Pres. Charles H. Pillard as he accepted a first-place award for the publication in the annual competition of the International Labor Press Association from AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland. Miss Downey, who had been an ILPA vice president, was editor of the Journal during most of the period covered by the award.

'High Overall Standards' Of Labor Press Praised

Atlantic City—"High overall standards and performance" were exemplified by the more than 400 entries in the 1969 Journalistic Awards competition of the International Labor Press Association, the judging panel reported.

The judges commended the publications for "scope and breadth" of the subject matter they presented and for "the large amount of space devoted to social, political and economic issues."

Of special interest, the report said, "was the manner in which many publications sought to develop a pride amongst union members —not only in their union, but in their profession or trade and in the dignity of labor."

The labor press, the judges said, "fills an important informational gap not met by the public press. For those who follow the labor press, the improvements over the past several years are evident, owing in no small degree, we suggest, to the ILPA. Persons outside the labor movement can substantially benefit through reading the labor press."

Nevertheless, the panel noted that "many areas for an improved labor press lie ahead," and the report made a number of recommendations on coverage and technical matters.

This year's judges were Curtis MacDougal of Northwestern University, Stan Rosen of the Chicago Institute of Labor & Industrial Relations, and Norman Dolnick, a former labor editor.

The winners are:

International Publications: Circulation of 150,000 or more, newspaper format, the American Teacher; magazine format, the Electrical Workers' Journal; 50,000 to 150,000 circulation — newspaper format, the Allied Industrial Worker; magazine format, International (Seafarers); less than 50,000 circulation—newspaper format, the Guild Reporter; magazine format, Canadian Labour.

State and Local Central Bodies Publications: 10,000 or more circulation, San Francisco Labor; less than 10,000 circulation, California AFL-CIO News.

Local Union Publications: 25,000 or more circulation, the United Teacher and 1199 Drug & Hospital News (tie) both of New York; 15,000-25,000 circulation, the Searchers, Steelworkers, Sudbury, Ont.; 5,000-15,000 circulation, FLM Joint Board Tempo, Meat Cutters, New York; less than 5,000 circulation, the Fire Fighter, Local 112, Los Angeles.

Special performance awards: Best cartoon—Belland, Guild Reporter; best original photograph—Steel Labor; best editorial—St. Paul, Minn., Union Advocate; best feature story—IUE News; unique performance — Public Employe Press, State, County & Municipal Employes, New York.

The Nixon Administration's social security recommendations also ran into immediate congressional opposition.

House minority leader Gerald Ford (R-Mich.) called for an increase in benefits "of at least 10 percent" but said they should become effective Jan. 1, 1970, instead of April 1. The House Democratic leadership has called for a 15 percent increase effective Jan. 1.

The AFL-CIO statement said the Administration's recommendation includes a number of improvements which should be enacted. "But the plight of the nation's largest poverty group will not be resolved by the meager and very limited improvements proposed by the Administration," it noted.

Under the Nixon proposal, the average social security payment would be increased from $100 to about $110 for a single person and from $168 to $185 for a couple. Widows would receive their husband's full benefit instead of 82.5 percent as now.

The Nixon proposal would raise the minimum payment from $55 to $61, whereas the AFL-CIO has called for a $100 minimum.

In another major development, the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare announced that Medicare patients will have to pay $8 additional on hospital bills beginning next Jan. 1.

This comes in the form of an increase in the deductible from $44 to $52 per hospital visit. The deductible is the amount the patient must pay before benefits.

ILPA Convention Theme:

Union Publications Viewed As Vital to Labor's Goals

Atlantic City—The nation's labor press will play a critical role in helping the trade union movement meet the social, legislative and political challenges of the 1970s.

This was the dominant theme pervading speeches and discussions at the four-day convention of the International Labor Press Association.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a message to the union editors, declared that organized labor is in better shape than ever to confront these challenges, but he warned that there is no time to glory in past victories.

"It is what we have got to achieve tomorrow that is important," Meany declared. "In this battle, the trade union press is indispensable."

He cited particularly issues of tax reform and the nomination of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., for the Supreme Court, noting that with few exceptions the commercial news media have failed to keep the public informed on these issues.

In all too many communities, Meany stressed, the labor press is the only medium providing an adequate analysis of the drive for tax justice or the full background on Haynsworth's anti-union, anti-civil rights record.

Michael Harrington of the League for Industrial Democracy, whose book "The Other America" helped arouse the nation to the plight of its poor, called on the labor editors to use their publications to strengthen the unity of American workers.

He reminded the delegates that more than half the population lacks the income to achieve a "modest but adequate" standard of living as defined by the federal government. Thus, he observed, the struggle for social progress affects not just the poor and the Negroes, but the majority of society.

On consumer problems, Arnold B. Elkind, chairman of the National Commission on Product Safety, appealed for active participation by the labor press to develop facts and alert readers in helping to end the "bloody carnage" caused by unsafe products on the market.

For years, Elkind said, the labor press was the only source of much of the day-to-day consumer information now taken for granted, and it has "earned its stripes" in the war for consumer safety.

"No matter what industry or industries your periodicals are oriented toward," he said, "you have knowledgeable readers who possess technical insights that plant managers and engineers may not always share. They can spot a design which will fail; they can also spot those which may hurt the user. . . .

"The main concern of the American consumer should be whether the product is worth the price, not whether it is worth his life."

Edward W. Barrett, former dean of the Columbia Graduate School of Journalism, focused on the dearth of effective criticism of the newspaper and broadcasting media, and urged the labor press to "expose and denounce shoddy and dishonest journalism" whether it affects basic trade union issues or not.

Barrett, who delivered the ILPA's A. J. Liebling memorial address, charged that newspapers and broadcasting stations "are too close to being sacrosanct, too nearly immune from criticism."

He called on local communities to fight vigorously against shoddy or dishonest newspapers, but he warned that intense competition or local ownership are not "automatic cures" for journalistic ills.

"We have to dig deeper, examine the individual cases within their contexts and, in many instances, evolve the strategy on an ad hoc basis if we are to have a reasonably and honestly informed public of the type that is essential to effective democratic government."

Fred Sweet, editor of the St. Paul, Minn., Union Advocate closed out his term as president of ILPA with an appeal to his fellow editors to help develop new sources of vitality for the labor press. Community labor papers especially need strengthening, Sweet observed, and many of them represent the sole outlet for liberal opinion in their areas.

Kenneth Fiester, public relations director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., who has been ILPA secretary-treasurer since 1961, was elected to succeed Sweet as president. John M. Barry, managing editor of the AFL-CIO News, was chosen as the new secretary-treasurer.

Ten incumbent vice presidents were given new terms: Roy LaBerge, Canadian Labour; Burton Beck, the Clothing Workers' Advance; Don Harris, the Los Angeles Citizen; E. T. (Buck) Harris, Screen Actor; Ray Pasnick, Steel Labor; William V. Scoggins, the Record, East Chicago, Ind.; David Selvin, San Francisco Labor; Max Steinbock, RWDSU Record; Aldo Vagnozzi, Michigan AFL-CIO News; J. R. Watkins, the Labor World, Chattanooga, Tenn.

New vice presidents are Ted Bleecker, United Teacher, New York; Charles Borsari, Ohio AFL-CIO News & Views; Al Herling, ABC News, American Bakery & Confectionery Workers; Sam Marshall, the Public Employe, State, County & Municipal Employes; George Scriven, United Rubber Worker.

AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis and Fred Hoehler, Jr., director of the new National Labor Studies Center, described the development of the center and outlined its program of training institutes planned for the first six months of operations.

Hoehler said the center will strive to develop trade union leadership and to involve its students in the total labor movement. Classes will be limited to 25 persons, with students accepted on a first-come, first-served basis.

The convention adopted a streamlined constitution and devoted four workshops to analyses of technical problems and improvement of professional skills. Herling led one workshop on localizing stories. Yoichi Okamoto, who was Pres. Johnson's official White House photographer, discussed the effective use of pictures. Frank Cremonosi of the Typographical Union's training school described the latest developments in printing equipment, and artist Bernie Seaman conducted the workshop on design and layout.

The editors also viewed a mixed media presentation by Holgate Young, education director of the Communications Workers, combining visual materials and sound tracks to stimulate discussion in union training programs.

Two-Year Pact Lifts Pay for Air Line Group

Chicago — The Air Line Employes Association has signed a two-year agreement with North Central Airlines which Pres. Victor J. Herbert said "finally cracked the barrier that has separated wages paid by regional carriers from those paid by the trunk lines."

The agreement calls for top-rated station and ticket agents to receive basic monthly earnings of $810 by September 1970. That will be $210 higher than their previous maximum.

Reservation agents and teletype operators would gain $227 to reach a top of $795, Herbert said. The contract is retroactive to March and some employes will receive as much as $1,000 in back pay.

Herbert also cited an unusually strong "scope clause" that protects contract work from non-union encroachment and improvements in pensions, insurance, vacations and shift premiums.

The Air Line Employes Association is an affiliate of the Air Line Pilots Association and represents 10,000 passenger service agents and related ground employes.

NEW OFFICERS of the International Labor Press Association talk things over after their election at the ILPA convention. Kenneth Fiester, left, public relations director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., was chosen as president and John M. Barry, managing editor of the AFL-CIO News, will succeed him as secretary-treasurer.

Direct Vote for President:

Electoral Reform Backed by Nixon

votes in proportion to the vote cast in that state.

The trouble with that plan—and the even more distorted district plan advanced by a number of congressional conservatives—is that it could result in the election of a President who received fewer votes than his opponent, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in congressional testimony earlier this year.

The AFL-CIO has been a major supporter of the direct election constitutional amendment.

Nixon issued a statement at the White House explaining his change of view. The overwhelming bipartisan House approval of the direct election proposal introduces "an entirely new factor" in the outlook for action, he said.

While some in the Senate might prefer another formula, "it is clear that unless the Senate follows the lead of the House all opportunity for reform will be lost this year and possibly for years to come."

He expressed the hope "that two-thirds of the Senate will approve the House-approved amendment as promptly as possible, so that all of us together can then urge the states also to give their approval."

Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.), chief Senate sponsor of the popular vote amendment, hailed Nixon's conversion and said it would greatly increase chances of Senate approval.

One immediate result was the announcement by the newly-elected Senate Republican leader, Hugh Scott of Pennsylvania, that he would support the direct election amendment if it won approval of the Senate Judiciary Committee as is considered likely.

Scott had been pushing the district plan, which would assign one vote to the candidate winning each congressional district and two votes to the statewide winner. If such a system had been in effect in the 1960 election, Nixon would have defeated John F. Kennedy for the presidency, even though Kennedy had more votes nationwide.

Congress completed final action on the labor-backed "day care amendment" to the Taft-Hartley Act.

Both the House and Senate had passed slightly different versions of the bill which permits employers to contribute to day care programs of children of working mothers and to scholarship programs negotiated by unions.

Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) chief Senate sponsor of the bill, won Senate agreement to accept the minor change in language in the House bill and the measure was sent to the White House to await the President's signature

The legislation had been sought particularly by the Clothing Workers and the Ladies' Garment Workers, which have been thwarted in attempting to negotiate child care and educational benefits because of a rigid interpretation of Taft-Hartley language.

The new legislation does not require an employer to bargain on these items, and it would not be an unfair labor practice for him to refuse to do so.

But it permits negotiation and contract agreement for these benefits and the payment of company funds to finance the programs.

The tug of war between congressional liberals and the Nixon Administration over the level of spending for major domestic programs was pointed up by two contrasting actions.

On the congressional side, the Senate Labor Committee voted to authorize—the congressional term for setting a spending ceiling— appropriations of $2.73 billion for the government's anti-poverty program for the current fiscal year.

That's $292 million more in authorizations than Nixon had requested.

Meanwhile, however, the Administration signalled a slowdown in the model cities program.

The money planned to be spent this year—already substantially below the amount contemplated in the legislation—will be cut 42 percent, the Administration announced.

It said the reduction from $515 million to $300 million will not affect contracts already signed by some 41 cities that have model cities rehabilitation programs under way.

But the cutback obviously dashed the plans of scores of other cities that have had programs approved by the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development but will have to wait at least another year for the money to carry them out.

The Senate moved towards approval of coal mine health and safety legislation after a compromise agreement on using federal funds to finance compensation for victims of the dreaded black lung disease—and their widows—and to finance research on mining health hazards.

The original bill approved by the Senate Labor Committee would have imposed a penny-a-ton tax on coal sold in the United States to finance a black lung research program.

Woll Named Chairman of ULLICO Board

J. Albert Woll has been elected chairman of the board of the Union Labor Life Insurance Co., succeeding the late Edmund P. Tobin.

Woll, who is general counsel for the AFL-CIO, has been closely associated with the company almost since its formation and has been a director for the past 15 years. He has been a member of the firm's executive committee since 1956.

He is the senior member of the Washington law firm, Woll & Mayer, and was the chief legal counsel to the AFL before the merger. He served in the Justice Dept.'s Criminal Division in the 1930s and as U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Illinois in the 1940s.

He is a director of the American Arbitration Association, treasurer of the National Conference on Citizenship, director of the National Legal Aid & Defender Association and a trustee of the National Council on Crime & Delinquency.

AIW Convention Spurs Coordinated Bargaining

Chicago—An expanded organizing and coordinated bargaining program—and the money to finance it—was approved by delegates to the Allied Industrial Workers' biennial convention.

The convention also approved a $1.50 per month increase in dues to finance the plan, which includes establishing a new post of organizing coordinator.

AIW Pres. Carl W. Griepentrog said the new structure will free the regional offices of the union to service the membership. Those offices previously had responsibility for organizing.

The AIW is involved in more than 30 coordinated bargaining programs through the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

"As more and more managements unite, we must unite," Griepentrog said. "We must unite with other unions in our bargaining and we must unite more firmly within our own international union if we are to survive and prosper in the future."

Griepentrog cited the experience of the AIW local in Springfield, Mo., as an example of the need for stronger joint strategy in bargaining. The Royal Typewriter plant, part of Litton Industries, was closed in April after a nine-week strike.

"I believe what happened in Springfield, Mo., is a tragic example of the inability of one local union, no matter what size and strength, in dealing with a conglomerate corporation," Griepentrog said.

"To Litton, the closing of the Springfield plant was not even a minor annoyance. It didn't affect their profit picture."

The convention also heard Sen. Philip A. Hart (R-Mich.) place the blame for continuing inflation on corporate profits rather than on wage increases.

Hart said the fallacy of wage increases being primarily responsible for inflation was so widespread that some union leaders were almost "apologetic" when they negotiate a pay hike.

Hart also discussed the problems involved in making group automobile insurance programs available across the country. He said a group plan could provide savings of up to 15 percent if it could be reconciled with varying state laws.

Other convention speakers included AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher and COPE Dir. Al Barkan.

Crackdown Urged On 'Postal' Firm

The "unfair and deceptive" practices of a company that represents itself as a "postal system" have been brought to the attention of the government by Pres. James H. Rademacher of the Letter Carriers.

He called upon the Federal Trade Commission to stop the Independent Postal System of America, Oklahoma City, from violating the federal law giving the government the exclusive right to operate a postal system and handle mail.

Rademacher charged the firm, which operates in cities throughout the United States, is illegally using terms such as "postal" and "mail" in its advertising.

He also asked FTC to halt another "deceptive" practice of the company—that of putting their employes "in uniforms similar to those of government mailmen to deliver their circulars."

Drive Opens For Tennessee Wage Floor

Nashville—The Tennessee State Labor Council launched a new campaign for the passage of a state minimum wage equal to the $1.60 federal standard.

Delegates to the sixth biennial state AFL-CIO convention voted to concentrate on the adoption of the minimum wage by the state legislature which convenes in January.

Two earlier efforts by labor forces fell short of victory. But Pres. Matt Lynch noted that prospects for the adoption of the minimum wage were brighter now than ever before.

The convention also voted to have the state body team up with the A. Philip Randolph Institute for the development of public housing projects for low-income families. The first building project is expected to be initiated within the next year.

Other resolutions called for a stepped-up effort to establish prepaid health plans in cooperation with local unions and support of gaining full union rights for public employes throughout the state.

The state council's four top officers, including Pres. Lynch, were re-elected to new two-year terms. The others are Sec.-Treas. Lee Case, First Vice Pres. H. T. Powell and Second Vice Pres. Charles Robinson.

Five new vice presidents were elected and 13 incumbents were re-elected at the three-day convention. The new vice presidents are John Ballard, Typographical Union, Memphis; E. L. Collins, Retail Clerks, Nashville; Jesse McCoy, Steelworkers, Chattanooga; Louis Miller, Communications Workers, Memphis, and Robert Watkins, Musicians, Chattanooga.

Lower Interest Goal Of Minnesota Suit

St. Paul, Minn.—A greater role in consumer affairs for the Minnesota labor movement was staked out at the State AFL-CIO's 12th constitutional convention here.

Delegates voted to initiate a lawsuit on behalf of union members and all consumers in Minnesota, which will seek to prove that present revolving charge account rates violate Minnesota usury statutes.

David K. Roe, president of the Minnesota AFL-CIO Federation of Labor, struck the opening blow in the battle for consumer protection when he called on the Minnesota Attorney General to take action to halt the 1.5 percent monthly interest charges on charge accounts.

Preparations are now being made by officials of the State AFL-CIO to start the lawsuit.

Efforts to strengthen the coalition composed of labor, farmers, minority groups and young people were another major development at the Minnesota labor convention.

The more than 700 delegates heard addresses from leaders of the Minnesota Farmers Union, the Minnesota Coalition to Lower the Voting Age, the Indian People of Minnesota, and the Minnesota Human Rights Dept.

Delegates later approved a resolution supporting extension of voting rights to 19-year-olds. Minnesota voters will vote on the extension in November 1970.

Labor union interest in preventing environmental pollution was praised by a member of the Minnesota Pollution Control Agency. Steve Gadler urged delegates to form a labor advisory committee to work with and advise the agency.

Convention delegates unanimously passed a resolution calling on former Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, long a friend of the labor movement, to run for the U.S. Senate in 1970.

The resolution was passed after a rousing address by Humphrey, urging organized labor to continue as a leader of the liberal coalition.

Delegates also heard Dir. Al Barkan of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education call the 1968 election "labor's finest hour."

Barkan also alerted delegates to prepare for a difficult 1970 election campaign, to assure that friends of the labor movement continue in office.

The 1968 campaign proved, Barkan said, that labor is a major political force, and that rank-and-file members respect union leadership.

The Minnesota labor movement was also asked to help resolve the greatest crisis facing the nation—that of human rights.

Making the plea was Frank Kent, human rights commissioner for the state of Minnesota. Kent praised labor's role in helping "make the American dream a reality."

Kent praised the State AFL-CIO and its officers for working to provide Minnesota with the strongest human rights law in the nation.

SMILES ALL AROUND greeted AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland as he was introduced to Union Label & Service Trades Dept. delegates by Department Pres. Richard F. Walsh, center, and Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis, right.

At 54th Union Label Convention:

'Buy Union' Appeal Stressed To Assure Gains in Standards

Atlantic City—The AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. appealed to union members and their families to "buy union" as the best assurance of protecting and advancing their living standards.

The union label, shop and store card and service button "must become the prime vehicle of progress for every trade union member," delegates to the department's 54th convention declared.

A report by a union-label promotion committee also urged all AFL-CIO unions to participate in the AFL-CIO's annual Union-Industries Show as "the one grand opportunity the public has of reviewing unions in a favorable fashion."

The department announced that the 1970 show will be held May 22-27 in New Orleans.

The convention membership committee reported four new union affiliates since 1967 making the total 91, and three new label councils for a total of 111. New union affiliates are the Maintenance of Way Employes, National Maritime Union, Marine & Shipbuilding Workers and the Roofers. New label councils are at Cape Girardeau, Mo., Lewistown, Pa. and Danville, Va.

Labels Increasing

More union labels, shop cards, store cards and service buttons are being used by unions than ever before, department Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis told the convention.

But, he warned, "there are a great number of phony labels coming out of company-union shops and racket-ridden independent union shops who are bootlegging labels of AFL-CIO unions and we are going to declare war on them."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany congratulated the department on the "splendid progress" it has made over the years as "one of our oldest divisions in the labor movement."

"Union labels are important," he said, "as important as they were back in the early days. They let people know the products that are made under the union label or the services that are rendered under the service button.

"It's also important to let our people know that one of the traditional weapons of the trade union movement was the idea of having trade union money spent so as to encourage trade union organization."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland spoke of the department's role in "reflecting the labor movement to the public" and helping to overcome a great deal of misinformation about labor left with the public by communication media.

Public opinion concerns "every function of a trade union," Kirkland said, and labor cannot afford to sit out the struggle for the good opinion of the public.

"Your message can be a convincing one that will take hold and hang on when other messages are forgotten," Kirkland said.

Pres. I. W. Abel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. thanked the department for the service and assistance it has given to IUD affiliates and the Steelworkers, which he heads.

Abel noted that "there have been great changes in the past few years" which have made the Steelworkers union-label conscious: Conglomerate mergers have thrust members into industries making all types of products; steel companies have themselves become manufacturers; a mounting flow of imports threatens members' jobs.

Canada Show

Henry Rhodes, secretary-treasurer of the Union Label Trades Dept. for the Canadian Labor Congress, announced that the CLC will sponsor its first exhibit of union-made products — patterned after the AFL-CIO's Union-Industries Show—in Kitchener, Ont., Oct. 3-7, 1970.

Retired AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler was presented a plaque by the convention for "outstanding service in support of the work of the department."

Convention speakers included Exec. Dir. Marcella Beatty of the AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries, Pres. Maywood Boggs of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., Pres. Paul Hall of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.; Ralph Wright, director of the Washington office of the International Labor Organization, and Larry Itliong, assistant director of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

Convention resolutions pledged the department's support for:

- The struggle of American farm workers to obtain economic justice and social progress through collective bargaining, and the boycott of California grapes.
- A drive to identify shops that run away to Mexico and other nations to profit on substantial wages and working conditions and get their products placed on the department's "We Don't Patronize" list.
- A continued boycott of the publications of Kingsport Press, Inc. of Kingsport, Tenn., where more than 1,000 members of five AFL-CIO unions have lost their jobs as the result of a strike going back to March 1963.
- The strike and lockout at the Los Angeles Herald-Examiner, where 2,000 men and women are pitted against the Hearst empire's "determination to destroy unions representing its employes."
- The establishment of a special labor committee to study the problems of imports in depth and take action deemed necessary "to protect American workers' jobs."

Labor Gives Support To School Lunch Bill

The AFL-CIO gave a "strong endorsement" to a Senate proposal to strengthen the nation's school lunch program.

In a statement submitted to the Senate Agriculture committee, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller cited several aspects of the bill as "forward-looking provisions which combine to make it a measure which ought to command broad support in the Congress and assure its prompt enactment."

The bill provides for amendments to the National School Lunch Act and the Child Nutrition Act of 1966.

Provisions of the bill praised by Biemiller include advance funding; the emphasis on feeding more needy children, the effort to bring state revenue into the funding, authorization of greater assistance in the purchase of food service equipment and operating expense and the establishment of a National Advisory Council on Child Nutrition.

"The bill, if enacted as we hope it will be, will not be the last word on the school program," the AFL-CIO statement said. "More will be needed to make the program the effective nutritional instrument we all hope it will one day be."

The bill provides for federal and local funds to be matched on a one-to-one ratio. Previously, the ratio was one-to-three, with the major part of the local funds collected from the school children.

Under the new bill, state funds would be used to help with the local share of the financing. The bill would require state revenues to make up 10 percent of the local matching requirement in the beginning, rising eventually to 50 percent.

Besides the authorizing of funds one year in advance of the fiscal year in which they would become available, the bill provides for a carryover of unused funds from year to year.

The bill also calls for an increase in "special assistance" appropriations, which would be extended to all schools. A ceiling of 20 cents would be imposed on reduced cost lunches and identification of the children receiving such assistance would be forbidden.

Other provisions in the bill call for use of up to 1 percent of the school lunch program's funds in nutritional training and education and studies of food service requirements. Federal grants would be made to state educational agencies for research and surveys in the field of school food service.

The bill was introduced by Sen. Herman E. Talmadge (D-Ga.) and co-sponsored by Senators Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), Ernest F. Hollings (D-S.C.), Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.), Frank E. Moss (D-Utah), Robert W. Packwood (R-Ore.), Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.) and George McGovern (D-S.D.).

3 Unions Ask Import Curbs In Electronics

Presidents of three AFL-CIO unions have called for a halt of the increasing flow of electronic goods into the United States from foreign countries.

They warned in an appeal to Ambassador Carl J. Gilbert, U.S. special representative for international trade negotiations, that American workers are losing their jobs because of the rising imports.

The appeal was issued by Charles H. Pillard of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, and Floyd E. Smith of the Machinists.

Jennings noted that the rising flood of imports from Japan, Taiwan, Korea, Hong Kong and Mexico has almost eliminated U.S. domestic production in some segments of the industry.

Much of the foreign competition is run by American firms, Smith pointed out. Often the American owners bring in the products under their own brand name—effectively hiding the foreign production.

Pillard estimated that about 40,000 American workers already have been displaced because of the imports. He said that more than 50 percent of black and white television sets and 25 percent of color TV sets sold in the United States this year will be of foreign production.

John J. McCartin Of Plumbers Dies

Chicago—Top officers of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters paid final tribute to a veteran union officer at services here in St. Barnabas Church for John J. McCartin, assistant general president of the union and a 50-year member of Steamfitters Local 612, later merged into Local 597. He died Sept. 20.

McCartin was considered an authority on union jurisdiction. He helped draft the "50 points" the union has used since 1938 to define trade jurisdiction. He served as labor adviser at the International Labor Conference in 1964 and 1965 and was an AFL-CIO delegate to the 1965 congress of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

FARM WORKERS need protection against the misuse of pesticides by table grape growers in California, Dir. Cesar Chavez (right) of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee and Manuel Vasquez, UFWOC boycott coordinator in Washington, D.C., tell a Senate subcommittee on migratory labor. They said the union has offered to reduce its wage proposals if growers will bargain on health and safety conditions in the fields.

Chavez Cites Hazards of Crop Poisons

Misuse of poisonous crop sprays by California growers is exposing farm workers to "la muerte andando—the walking death," Dir. Cesar Chavez of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO, told the Senate subcommittee on Migratory Labor.

Vineyard owners are using harmful pesticides in ever-increasing amounts in California and most growers refuse to talk with the union about the health of their workers, said Chavez.

"The worst thing" about the use of sprays and other chemical bug killers is "the long-time effect on our kids," he told Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) and his subcommittee.

California laws require only that the grower post notices on fields that he intends to spray. No law requires the employer to tell what poisons were used, and enforcement of the law is practically nonexistent, Chavez said. He reported the union has been trying without success for nearly a year to get information on pesticides from state and county agricultural officials.

The issue of the health and safety of farm workers is "the single most important issue facing" the union, Chavez declared. In California, he said, the agricultural industry has the highest occupational disease rate—more than 50 percent higher than that of the second-place industry and three times as high as the average rate of all California industry.

The problem is compounded by the lack of clean drinking water, and inadequate toilet facilities in the fields and in labor camps provided by the employer, Chavez asserted.

He charged that "thousands of workers experience daily symptoms of chemical poisoning," and when ill they get no workmen's compensation, he explained.

As Crises Mount:

Delay in Congress Scored by Council

Atlantic City—A conservative mood sent Congress into a slowdown last year and this year it has ground almost to a halt while awaiting recommendations from the Nixon Administration, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said in its report to the federation's convention.

"In spite of the crises in the cities, few major new proposals to aid the cities were considered in 1968 with the exception of the landmark housing bill," the council said. "The only major legislation passed by the 91st Congress in the first eight months and signed into law has been construction safety."

As a result, the council called the congressional pace before the August recess "one of the least productive of recent record."

In addition to the housing bill, the council said the second session of the 90th Congress during 1968 "did take forward steps in civil rights and consumer protection."

A bill prohibiting discrimination in the sale or rental of housing, which the council called one of the last areas to be touched by civil rights legislation, was passed, as were four major consumer protection laws — truth-in-lending, poultry inspection, gas pipeline safety and an auto insurance study.

The council called the 1968 housing bill "one of most far-reaching housing laws in congressional history, including a new program to encourage home ownership among low- and moderate-income families by providing federal subsidies on mortgage payments."

The outcome is still uncertain on tax reform, one of the major legislative activities of 1969, the council pointed out in recounting the year-long struggle on the bill, which still awaits Senate action.

"The AFL-CIO placed before the House Ways & Means Committee a comprehensive tax reform bill that would bring $14 to $17 billion in income and provide approximately $8 billion in relief to low- and middle-income families," the report said.

The reform bill which eventually passed the House was termed "a major step down the road toward tax justice" but the Senate was urged "to improve and build on the measure."

In other areas, the council report cited these developments on legislation in which the AFL-CIO had a particular interest:

- The 90th Congress enacted legislation to bar discrimination in employment on the basis of age.
- The 90th Congress widened and strengthened federal powers to control air pollution.
- The Appalachian Regional Development Act provided funds for highway development and public works projects related generally to health, education and industrial development in the 13-state region.
- Throughout the 90th Congress, the revived Republican-Dixiecrat conservative coalition forced drastic cutbacks in federal spending for liberal domestic social welfare measures, including a $6 billion cut in Pres. Johnson's proposed budget for fiscal 1969.
- High auto insurance rates and discrimination in sales stimulated action to get under way a comprehensive study of the automobile insurance industry.
- Action was started on protection for children from hazardous toys.
- Legislation has been introduced in both the Senate and House to establish a Dept. of Consumer Affairs.
- Constitutional amendments to reduce the voting age to 18 have been introduced by several House and Senate members.
- House Labor Subcommittee hearings revealed a serious record of flagrant employer violations of workers' rights to join unions.
- Efforts have continued to gain the power to issue cease-and-desist orders for the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.
- Farm workers have thus far failed to win the long-overdue right to organize and bargain collectively.
- Hearings have been completed on a fish inspection bill.
- Prodded by hearings by a Senate committee and a groundswell of public support, the Senate voted June 24 to more than double the fiscal 1970 authorization for the food stamp program.
- The 1968 omnibus higher education law authorized $2.9 billion for fiscal 1970 and $3.5 billion for fiscal 1971 to help needy college students.
- Updating of Hill-Burton financing for hospital construction was begun in the 91st Congress, but with versions far short of AFL-CIO goals.
- Hearings are still pending on bills to prevent green cards from being used by migrants to undermine American wages and working conditions.
- Congress is still awaiting an Administration proposal for consolidation of manpower programs and no hearings have been scheduled on the O'Hara bill, which includes the concept of public service employment.
- The Senate approved the ratification of a nuclear non-proliferation treaty.
- A Senate committee held hearings last year on occupational health and safety, but took no further action after companion legislation bogged down in the House. New hearings are under way.
- A modest but significant victory was scored in the Pipeline Safety Act passed by the 90th Congress.
- Despite widespread bipartisan support, the 90th Congress failed to enact a bill to allow situs picketing.
- The 90th Congress enacted safety standards for television sets to protect viewers from radiation, but failed to include protections for workers, who face the greatest potential danger.
- A utility consumer protection bill has been introduced to create an independent agency to represent the interests of consumers before federal and state regulatory agencies with respect to electric, gas, telephone and telegraph utilities.
- Significant improvements in the nation's vocational education system were approved by the 90th Congress, but Nixon's budget for fiscal 1970 requests $279 million compared with an authorization of $767 million.
- Nixon's proposal of a one-year extension of the Economic Opportunity Act was sharply criticized and House testimony has been heard in support of a longer authorization.

The Council also reported that so far, attempts have been successful in beating back obvious anti-labor legislation. These attempts have included a bid to replace the NLRB with a Labor Court and two bills which would curtail labor's political education activities.

Postal Unions Seek Passage Of Wage Hike

Spokesmen for AFL-CIO postal unions, representing more than 500,000 workers, urged the Senate to approve a bill giving postal employes a 5.4 percent raise this year and to set up a commission with union representation to propose annual raises for all government workers in the future.

James H. Rademacher, president of the Letter Carriers, said an "emergency" raise for rank-and-file postal workers is needed because the 4.1 percent increase they received in July left them far behind both the comparability with private industry goal and the rise in living costs.

He said most postal workers are in dead-end jobs, with no opportunity for promotion, and dependent on Congress for higher pay.

Pat Nilan, legislative director of the Postal Clerks, and spokesmen for several smaller crafts also joined in urging the Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committee to act on the pay bill. The union-endorsed legislation is a companion bill to one which has been approved by the House Post Office Committee but has not been scheduled for floor action.

Also testifying were officers of the Post Office & General Services Maintenance Employes, the Special Delivery Messengers, Post Office Motor Vehicle Employes, and the Mail Handlers, an affiliate of the Laborers.

Muskie to Lecture On Hillman Grant

The Sidney Hillman Foundation is sponsoring a series of lectures by Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.) at five universities throughout the South.

The first appearance will be at the University of Tennessee in Knoxville, Oct. 16-17. Subsequent lectures will be delivered by the senator at the University of Georgia, University of Miami, University of Mississippi and Clark College in Atlanta.

Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers and the Hillman Foundation said the lecture series is part of the foundation's efforts to continue the endeavors of Sidney Hillman in his concern for problems affecting public welfare, human rights and world peace.

Modest Gains Cited In State Labor Laws

Atlantic City—An Executive Council report to the AFL-CIO convention showed that a wide variety of labor laws were enacted in state legislatures over the past two years.

On balance, the report indicated modest progress but not as much as in some previous periods. The bulk of labor's programs was ignored by legislatures that became more conservative.

The council cited improvements in minimum wage standards in 10 states, but most of the states' minimums were still below the level of the federal Fair Labor Standards Act.

Maryland, Nevada, Delaware, Hawaii and Maine provided step increases that will bring large numbers of workers up to a $1.60 an hour level in 1970 or 1971. Vermont legislation set that level immediately.

North Carolina increased its rate from $1 to $1.25 and Arkansas provided for an increase from $1 to $1.20. South Dakota joined the list of states with a minimum wage law. Its level is $1. New York expanded its law's coverage and set a $1.40 minimum for farm workers, going to $1.50 in 1971.

Nebraska and South Dakota granted public employes the right to collective bargaining. Nevada granted such rights to local government employes. North Dakota granted public school employes the right to bargain.

Several states with public employes' bargaining laws already on the books extended their coverage.

In the private employment sector, Massachusetts extended its labor relations act to cover employes in charitable homes. New York passed legislation to impose new penalties on public workers who strike, as well as hospital and nursing home employes in the private sector.

Occupational health and safety laws were improved in a number of states. There also were enactments to protect workers against radiation in nuclear industries and other dangers in hazardous jobs.

Louisiana became the 38th state to enact a law requiring the payment of prevailing private wages on public works. Kentucky, Montana, Nevada and Maryland provided for the payment of prevailing fringe benefits on public construction.

The council reported that 33 states have passed some sort of call for a constitutional convention to rescind the U.S. Supreme Court's one-man, one-vote decision. It takes 34 states to secure such a convention, which is strongly opposed by labor.

However, the report pointed out that there is doubt as to the legality and permanency of many of the state petitions calling for the convention.

The council noted that resolutions to rescind previous calls for the convention passed in one house or the other of five states between 1967 and 1969: Maryland, Texas, North Carolina, Illinois and Washington.

So far only three states—New Mexico, Oklahoma and Utah—have adopted protections against harsh garnishment of workers' wages, the council said.

Oklahoma and Utah added provisions to existing laws so as to limit the cases in which employers can fire workers whose pay is garnished. Montana now completely protects employes from such firings.

Membership Growth Shown By AFL-CIO

Atlantic City—Continued growth of AFL-CIO unions is reflected in the membership report of the Executive Council to the convention.

Based on average per capita payments over the past two years, membership was 13,005,000 as of July 31.

While this shows a decline from the 13,781,000 total in 1967, it does not include the Auto Workers, who disaffiliated in 1968. Exclusive of UAW membership, this year's figure represents a gain of 549,000.

Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland reported that the net worth of the federation declined by $383,882.33 in the two-year period ended June 30. He noted that the decline was attributable to an excess of expenses.

Income over the two years came to $21,438,799.42 as against operating expenses of $21,822,681.75. The bulk of the income—$18,734,604.94—came from per capita taxes paid by national and international unions and organizing committees. An additional $1,860,665.87 came from directly affiliated local unions in per capita taxes, initiation fees and reinstatement fees.

Kirkland's report included a dozen statements detailing income and expenditures. A financial report of the AFL-CIO pension plan trustees also was included in the section.

Humanizing the System

FROM THE VERY BEGINNING back in the 1880s the American trade union movement has been based on strong local and national unions with the prime purpose of negotiating agreements with employers as to conditions day-in and day-out at the work place. But it has also been based on union organizations that can effectively present their views on legislation and government policies at city hall, state capitals and to the nation, on legislative and government policies that affect not just our members but affect everybody and in a sense affect the society in which we live.

The founders of the American trade union movement saw this great potential for improvement within the American system through the exercise of this right to organize trade unions for the purpose of bargaining, for the purpose of legislation, for the purpose of acting as a people's lobby.

These labor leaders had the vision to accept the challenge of America that lay in its foundation, the opportunity that was there to exercise the constitutional rights of individuals and free institutions to seek and achieve improvement within the basic structure of our society, not just improvements for us but improvement for the whole society.

Over the years the trade union movement has served to humanize our economic system. It has not been easy. We have had obstacles all along the way but we have made progress.

Strong resistance, for instance, greeted the unions when they sought the eight-hour day, factory inspection laws, workmen's compensation laws, medical insurance, pension plans. More recently we had the same kind of resistance to overcome when we promoted Medicare.

RESISTANCE CONTINUES to the humanizing efforts of the trade union movement. For instance, we find resistance to federal legislation in the field of occupational health and safety. Here is an area where you would assume in this modern day that you wouldn't get any resistance because the consequences of accidents on the job not only reach the family of the person affected but they affect the community as a whole.

In humanizing the economy trade unions have made the economy stronger and prosperous. We have helped to build American mass markets, and these mass markets are still the envy of the world as well as being the foundation of our whole national economy.

I take a good deal of pride as president of the AFL-CIO in our role in national affairs. We serve as the advocate, the lobby, not only for organized workers but for those without voice, those without power or privilege who have no other effective spokesman.

We play a part and we operate through the trade union structure called the AFL-CIO which in the final analysis is a co-ordinating organization. It is not a parent body. It is erroneously called a parent body. The AFL-CIO is not the parent of the national unions that comprise the AFL-CIO. It's the other way around. We are a federation, just as the name implies, of autonomous unions split up into departments, central bodies, 60,000 local unions.

What we need to do is to use this structure, use it as we have in the past and give a little more effort in all of the areas where we have been active. In other words, what we need is a little more of the same that we have been practicing over the years, national unions, local unions, everybody working as a unit . . . making a contribution to this never-ending campaign for a better life for all the people of America.

A Word Edgewise:

Provocateurs of Campus Unrest Trigger Avalanche of Reaction

By John P. Roche

AS THE COLLEGE YEAR begins, the disruptive forces are in an advanced state of polycentrism. This is no more a source of relief to university faculties and administrators than is the polycentric character of communism to the Secretary of State. Indeed, one can argue that it makes life more difficult, more unpredictable. Instead of coping with one opponent who could be counted on to maintain discipline on his side of the barricade (as the extremely cautious Stalin did), one encounters a dozen enemies, each trying to outplay the others.

In campus terms, this means that if Students for a Democratic Society demands open admissions, the Women's Liberation League will insist on 51 percent of the new students being female. The "Black" organization will join the fun by denouncing the women—who, they say, should be home rearing revolutionaries, not out shooting off their mouths in a man's league—and excoriating SDS as "racist" because open admissions will only perpetuate the present condition of "white cultural genocide."

The sensible university response to all this is to set up a campus version of Hyde Park in London: an area where every enthusiast with a nostrum can bring his own soapbox and make a pitch to anyone who wants to listen. (For obvious reasons, this should not be located in the president's office.)

However, this classic sanctuary for freedom of speech is considered a denial of their rights by extremists. They do not just want the right to be heard; they want to enforce the true faith. In fact, to them Hyde Park is a perfect example of what Herbert Marcuse designated "repressive tolerance"—tolerance that fundamentally buttresses the status quo and tranquilizes militancy.

Marcuse went so far as to justify the denial of civil rights to groups that "promote aggressive policies, armament, chauvinism, discrimination," and added that "the restoration of freedom of thought may necessitate new and rigid restrictions on teachings and practices in the educational institutions."

In this spirit, the New University Conference (a faculty version of SDS) has advocated an offensive against "faculty war criminals and racists." Since by their standards anyone who does not support Hanoi is a "war criminal," and Roy Wilkins is a hopeless "racist," this gives them quite a field to play against.

This makes for great rhetoric, but in strategic terms it is preposterous. Sure, campuses can be disrupted and perhaps some "war criminals" and "racists" intimidated. But when these extremists advocate violence, they are legitimatizing the use of force to take them out of circulation. If they name the weapons, they really can't complain if they lose the battle.

This point was made with superb sarcasm by the Warden and Fellows of Wadham College in Oxford. Replying to a set of "non-negotiable demands," they wrote:

"Dear Gentlemen: We note your threat to take what you call 'direct action' unless your demands are immediately met. We feel that it is only sporting to let you know that our governing body includes three experts in chemical warfare, two ex-commandos skilled with dynamite and torturing prisoners, four qualified marksmen in both small arms and rifles, two ex-artillerymen, one holder of the Victoria Cross, four karate experts, and a chaplain. The governing body has authorized me to tell you that we look forward with confidence to what you call a 'confrontation,' and I may say even with anticipation."

MOST AMERICAN colleges and universities cannot boast such a table of organization, but the basic point seems to be getting across to the saner spokesmen of the New Left. Even Marcuse has objected to breaking up classes, perhaps because he has found himself shouted down and labelled a CIA provocateur on recent occasions.

Recently, in "The Radical Teacher," Staughton Lynd (who must by now be a grandfather figure in SDS circles) laid it on the line very precisely. To justify repression "of the speech and action of one's opponents, so that one may oneself come to power, is to invite one's opponents, who presently have the power, to use it in the same spirit."

Those of us who have fought for the First Amendment rights of everyone from the leaders of the Communist Party to American Nazis take a dim view of this argument about free speech. But at least it shows common sense, some recognition of the folk wisdom that "you don't challenge a bear to a hugging contest."

Labor Faces Challenges:

Status Quo Isn't Good Enough, Meany Says in Urging Progress

The following is excerpted from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's report to the convention contained in the Report of the Executive Council.

NEW PROBLEMS, new challenges, new needs face today's labor movement.

And they cannot be met by those who fall victim to the smugness of satisfaction. What we have is not good enough; America needs much more.

Let me first make unmistakably clear my utmost faith in the ability of the American economy and political systems to adapt to and successfully meet any and all challenges. The space program and the lunar landing prove this above all else.

America has the ability to solve seemingly impossible problems. With the wise use of abundant resources, it needs only a national will—a will of the people—to solve them.

America is a good place to work for most people—but not all of them.

America remains a land of opportunity for most—but not all—people.

For the hard fact is that not all Americans share in the wealth and goodness of America, and thus we cannot be satisfied.

In the early 1960s, America began a determined effort to achieve economic and political well-being for all Americans for all time. Racial discrimination, poverty, and barriers to education were put under the focus of the national spotlight. Price fixing and profiteering, consumer deception, callous drug and medical practices were exposed.

Midway, however, the drive faltered. The Congress failed to measure up to the need and America got half-hearted, underfinanced, so-called social reform legislation—all facts described in detail in this report.

So the result is that America, as a place to live and to work, is still far from ideal.

The United States still knows poverty and slums, poor educational systems and medical care too costly for many, business fraud and deception. And there remains the overriding danger of war and nuclear holocaust for the enemies of freedom have not changed their course and still seek world domination.

And while lack of opportunity and a low standard of living are threats to some people, there also exist dangers which threaten all people. These are dangers which make no distinction between rich and poor, city and country dweller, worker and employer. They are, perhaps, the least excusable of all.

Consider, for example, the air we breathe. Air pollution presents a real danger to the American people.

Generally, we regard the air we breathe and thrive in as a free gift of nature, available to all at no cost. This isn't true. Dirty air costs money—in fact, dirty air costs the average American family nearly $230 a year.

Yet, the average expenditure for the control of air pollution amounts to less than 20 cents per person, per year.

Some 100 million motor vehicles discharge 300,000 tons of pollution into the air each day. Atmospheric pollution by vehicles will increase by 75 percent in the next 10 years and double by 1985.

Industrial plants emit, each day, tons of solid waste and gases into the air we breathe.

The dangers of dirty air are all too obvious in cities everywhere. Congress has recognized the problem since 1963, but federal funds have been too limited and state and local concern too lax to get beyond the pilot project and research stages.

What is needed to combat atmospheric poison is a comprehensive and integrated federal regional, state and local air pollution control program.

Just as the air we breathe is dangerous, so is the water many Americans drink and in which they swim.

The dependable supply of usable water available in America is about 315 billion gallons a day. In just 30 years, this amount will supply only one-third of the demand.

Low-cost water, now taken for granted in most sections of the country, may become America's most expensive basic natural resource.

Currently, 95 million Americans drink water which is below federal health standards.

Some 64 million Americans use waste treatment facilities which are inadequate and spread poison and germs in rivers, streams, lakes and underground reservoirs.

INDUSTRY DUMPS life-destroying chemicals and wastes into the waters people must depend upon to live clean and healthy lives.

Necessary to meet the danger of short water supply are stepped up salt water conversion and reclaimed and re-use programs.

Necessary to stem the tide of pollution are industrial oil and chemical pollution-control programs; accelerated construction of modern waste treatment plants and facilities in hundreds of communities; and federal authority to establish and enforce clean and healthful water standards throughout the United States.

Clean air and water must rank high on the list of national priorities if America is to be an excellent place to live, now and in the future.

In sum, many of the dangers that exist in America today are man-made and they must be solved by man.

They can no longer be ignored or given only half-hearted attention.

For a temporary period of time, we can exist as the richest nation on earth, surrounded by social dangers and poisonous elements.

But in America, it was intended that people should live full and rich lives in a healthy and wholesome environment.

In order to fulfill this promise of life, we Americans will have to unite in a common purpose toward this goal.

The time to begin is now. The place to begin is with this Eighth Constitutional Convention of the AFL-CIO.

Kircher Hopeful:

Progress Seen in Grape Strike With Growing Boycott Action

STEPPED-UP BOYCOTT ACTION and the resumption of contract talks with grape growers could lead to a breakthrough in the long farm dispute—including an end to the boycott, the AFL-CIO organizing director suggested.

If the growers will only "do what thousands of other employers have done—sit down and bargain with the union . . . this battle will be behind us," declared William L. Kircher, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization.

He said the measure of success of the drive to build a union can be seen in the "ten major contracts" the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee has won in the wine industry. The Perelli-Minetti wine company recently renewed its contract with the UFWOC.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, Kircher said that while the grape boycott may work a hardship on some of the workers by shrinking the grape market, "it is the only machinery that the farm workers have to attain the kind of collective bargaining status" that will end the "deprivation that has characterized their working conditions in the past."

KIRCHER SAID he is "very disappointed with the response of the Nixon Administration" to the farm workers. With "substantial representation from California in the administrative and executive levels . . . there should be a great deal of knowledge about this problem and expertise on it." But, he said, there is "little to indicate much sensitivity." He added that the Administration's "proffered legislation in this area . . . is very inadequate . . . a very poor piece of legislation."

Kircher said that a major drive to renew and stimulate the grape boycott is now under way in 13 major eastern cities, as UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez makes a six-week tour through the area. He said the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service also has been asked to re-enter contract talks.

By Press Associates, Inc.

THERE WAS A TIME when the fight on pollution was largely an esthetic or social one. People were unhappy about offensive odors or their inability to go swimming in rivers, lake or ocean waters, where they had once swum as children. The idea that noise could constitute a form of pollution was unheard of.

In time pollution took on more serious aspects. Smog in our great cities has become more than a joke of stand-up comedians. It has become a threat to the very lives of thousands of our citizens, whose health has been impaired. It has become costly in terms of the cleaning of clothes that have been dirtied, extra visits to doctors to care for ailments caused by lung diseases and the cost of extra lighting. In fact it has been estimated that dirty air costs the average American family nearly $230 a year.

Water pollution, too, has become a major problem for our people. Billions of dollars must be spent to make our drinking water potable—even at best, most of us drink aseptic sewage—as day after day, vast quantities of pollution are poured into our natural water supplies through human waste and industrial products.

Chemically treated, as much of our drinking water is, it has been estimated that no less than 95 million Americans—almost half our population—drink water which is below federal health standards.

Of late, scientists have found that noise must be added to the list of pollutants that surround us. Studies have shown serious loss of hearing because of excessive noise.

In recent years, notably in recent months, a startling note of urgency has come into the voices of scientists and experts who are warning us that the dimensions of the problems have grown vastly, that we are polluting the very world in which we live. Some have gone so far as to say that day by day, the human race is polluting its environment to the point where the earth itself may become uninhabitable.

Almost incomprehensible as this may be, the hard fact is, the modern world is drastically changing the earth's ecology—the relation between life and the environment in which it lives.

This is no light matter.

In our own country, one of our most precious national possessions, the Great Lakes, is literally dying. Lake Erie, some experts say, is already dead and may even become a vast swamp to bring ruin and disaster on millions of Americans. Industrial, farm and human waste have overwhelmed it.

What can be done?

CONGRESS HAS SHOWN SIGNS that it is becoming more and more aware of the threat that pollution holds for American life. The big hang-up has been money, the problem of adequately funding anti-pollution legislation already on the books.

Right now, Congress must decide how much money it will provide to carry out the Water Quality Control Act of 1966. The 1966 legislation set $1 billion as the amount needed, yet the Nixon Administration has pared this down to only $214 million, the same amount as was appropriated last year.

The Water Quality Act provides federal aid for the development of sewage treatment plants by states and local communities. It is crucial to any meaningful attack on sewage pollution and a number of congressmen are planning an amendment to the appropriation to bring it back to the $1 billion mark.

The House also has passed a bill calling for the creation of a permanent, high-level, five-man council appointed by the President to study and report annually on pollution and the steps that are being taken to resolve it. Such a council would be similar to the Council of Economic Advisers, which now plays so important a role in the economic thinking of the country. The Senate must still act.

"Too little, too late," is one of the grimmest commentaries on many of the efforts of mankind to solve its problems. "Too little, too late," in the field of pollution could well mean the end of mankind.

INCREASED BOYCOTT ACTIVITY against California grapes and contracts negotiated by the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee are hopeful signs, AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher, center, told reporters Tom Joyce, left, of Newsweek magazine and Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times, on Labor News Conference. The AFL-CIO-produced public affairs interview is aired Tuesdays, at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on Mutual radio.

New Channels Charted in Labor's Programs of Community Services

Atlantic City—New channels were charted in several areas of community services in the past two years by the AFL-CIO and its affiliates, the Executive Council reported.

With leadership from the federation's Dept. of Community Services, experimental programs were launched in:

- Referral service to aid community residents in personal and family problems on a 'round-the-clock basis.
- Training of workers to act as "buddies" to newly-hired employes from the ranks of the hard-core unemployed.
- Arts demonstration projects in an effort to culturally enrich the lives of union members.

The community referral services project was launched by the Fire Fighters in cooperation with the AFL-CIO-CSA in Dayton, O. The department helped train the fire fighters in Dayton and Washington, D.C., to assist residents in the neighborhoods of their fire engine companies. At least three other communities are expected to participate in the 24-hour referral service.

In cooperation with the National Alliance of Businessmen, the CSA helped trigger the "buddies" demonstration project in five communities: Atlanta, Cleveland, Houston, Milwaukee and Portland, Ore. It helped train the workers to ease the problems of the hard-core unemployed. This program is now being continued by the federation's Human Resources Development Institute.

The arts demonstration project was initiated through the efforts of CSA and the federation's Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes Council. Pilot operations now exist in four cities: Louisville, Buffalo, Minneapolis and New York.

One result is that union members may attend cultural events—including operas, symphonies and ballets—at reduced rates. Ultimately, the project will enlist the talents of union members in the creation as well as appreciation of the arts and be extended to many other cities.

All these functions are being performed throughout the country by community service committees of state and local central labor bodies and local unions. They are assisted in their efforts by 160 full-time AFL-CIO-CSA liaison representatives on the staffs of United Funds and Community Chests in 126 communities.

National conferences and workshops sponsored by the CSA were attended by 400 delegates in both 1968 and 1969. The role of labor in community services and the effect of its programs in the changing communities were stressed in the conferences.

The department also conducted hundreds of training programs on the state, area and local level. They included seminars, classes on community services, union counselling, consumer counselling, recreation, public welfare and youth activities.

In noting the achievements of the department, the Executive Council said:

"It has helped bind our communities in a year of conflict. By encouraging everyone to work together for a better community for all, labor and management, black and white, young and old, the AFL-CIO community services program has contributed to the development of thousands of dedicated volunteers and community leaders who are the backbone of the democratic society."

Rail Labor Newspaper Marks Its 50th Birthday

One of the oldest and best-known publications in the trade union movement is celebrating its 50th birthday. It is Labor, the national newspaper owned by 14 unions representing railroad, airline and other workers in the United States.

Labor newspaper was founded by railroad unions in 1919 as an organ of the Plumb Plan League, formed to battle for continued government operation of the railroads which had been put under federal operation during World War I. The League failed but the paper succeeded.

The first issue had four pages and circulated 25,000 copies. It was dedicated to telling workers "the truth about national and international events as they may be viewed from Washington."

Today, Labor has a circulation of over a half million and its recent offspring, Canadian Railwayman, goes to 70,000 more subscribers in Canada.

The newspaper, famed as a crusader for the rights of railroaders and other workers, was edited by Edward Keating from its founding to 1953, and since by Ruben Levin. A trademark through all of its years has been the cartoons of John Baer, a congressman during Pres. Wilson's Administration.

For Workers, Aged:

Social Programs 'Unfinished Task'

Atlantic City—The nation must accomplish "the unfinished task of providing aged citizens adequate income to live out their last years in dignity and comfort," the AFL-CIO Executive Council stressed.

It recalled that the 1967 AFL-CIO convention advanced a program dedicated to fulfilling the task. But, it added, "the pace of legislative progress in Congress falls short of the goals of that program."

Recently, legislation embodying the major social security goals of the AFL-CIO was introduced in the House by Rep. Jacob H. Gilbert (D-N.Y.). It would raise total benefits by at least 50 percent by 1974 and virtually wipe out poverty among the aged.

Pres. Nixon has asked Congress to enact a 10 percent increase in security benefits, effective next Apr. 1.

The Executive Council's report also called for labor's all-out efforts in Congress, state legislatures and at the bargaining table for stronger protection for workers against the dangers of unemployment, illness and injury.

The council cited gains made in these areas over the past two years, but found that progress fell far short of needs.

Medicare has been a boon to the aged but the program still contains "a number of major defects that must be remedied," the council said.

It pointed particularly to the need for including the cost of prescription drugs under Medicare and its extension to include persons under 65 who are receiving disability benefits under social security.

The rising costs of Medicare—both in hospital charges and doctors bills—are of great concern, the report said. It focused on charges of "abuses" by doctors, hospitals, nursing homes under both Medicare and Medicaid.

The federal-state Medicaid program to provide medical care for the poor has been under attack in many areas because it has been more costly than Congress and states anticipated.

Taking note of this, the council deplored a reaction to date by the states of cutting services instead of instituting cost controls and "taking responsibility for effectively administering the program."

The Administration's budget request of a $505 million cutback on federal funds for Medicaid for the coming year "will hamper the state-operated plans even more," the report said.

The 1967 social security amendments placed "harsh and punitive" restrictions on federal aid to families with dependent children but did nothing to correct "long recognized defects in our public welfare system," the council reported.

It pledged the AFL-CIO to do everything possible to remove the restrictions while at the same time pressing for much needed improvements in the welfare system.

The section of the report on public welfare singled out the need for "significant expansion" of day care centers to take care of the children of working mothers. Without expansion, it said, mandatory training and employment for recipients of Aid to Families with Dependent Children cannot succeed.

A major shortcoming of Congress has been its failure to enact federal standards governing the amount of unemployment benefits, their duration and terms for qualifying to receive them, the council declared.

It charged that Pres. Nixon's unemployment compensation bill now before Congress "falls far short of the changes needed to significantly improve" the federal-state jobless program.

The proposal would extend coverage to 4.8 million of an estimated 17 million persons not covered by unemployment benefits and provide an additional period of federal benefits during extreme national recessions.

But, the council pointed out, the legislation contains no standards for benefit levels and benefit durations, and is "inadequate" in meeting the problems of the long-term unemployed. Further, the report said, it contains some provisions that would actually worsen the existing program.

The President's call for states to provide an unemployment benefit for workers equal to at least 50 percent of their average weekly wage is futile—and experience proves it, the council declared.

Its report in this area showed that 17 states enacted increases in weekly unemployment benefits in 1968 and 1969 but none of them reached the level called for by Nixon. Only two states meet the one-half of normal pay standard.

There has been virtually no state legislation enacted to extend unemployment insurance protection to additional workers and "absolutely no legislation to increase the taxable wage base" during the past two years, the report said.

The council listed some gains in improving workmen's compensation in states over the past two years but added that despite the strong efforts of labor in legislatures "workmen's compensation continues to be our most neglected area of social insurance."

In calling for federal legislation to "substantially improve the entire system of workmen's compensation," the council noted that 25 percent of the nation's workforce—16 million workers — are "still denied the protection of workmen's compensation."

Other sections of the report dealt with union activities in negotiating health and welfare benefits and pensions. The report also traced AFL-CIO testimony in Congress in support of legislation to protect the assets of health, welfare and pension plans.

The council reiterated labor's previous call for a National Health Insurance system as the ultimate answer to providing adequate health services for all Americans, rich and poor alike.

"All other advanced countries of the western world have a national system of providing or of financing health care for all citizens" and "it is time for the United States" to follow their example, the report concluded.

Council Warns of Recession:

Nation's Economy Distorted By Profits Outgaining Wages

Atlantic City—"Dangerously wrong" government policies threaten the nation with rising unemployment and recession, the AFL-CIO Executive Council warned.

Its review of the economic state of the nation pinpointed the distortions that crept into the general economic prosperity of the 1960s and built up to the critical stage.

The delicate balance of the economy was tilted by soaring corporate profits that far outpaced wage advantages.

A dubious investment credit tax bonus to business and industry spurred a capital goods inflation at the same time wage-earners were being asked to pay more in taxes to take money out of the economy.

And inflation was fed, at the same time that housing was thrown into a severe recession, by a tight-money policy that sent interest rates to record highs.

Where a surgeon's scalpel was required to carve out the principal sources of inflation, the government used a "blunderbuss" approach of "restrictive economic policies, tight money and sky-high interest rates."

The effect, the council report noted, has been to slow economic growth to the danger point—without curbing high prices.

The Executive Council vividly portrayed the impact of the tight money policy and bank profiteering in these terms:

"Soaring interest rates touched levels never before reached in the memory of living Americans. These skyrocketing interest rates were increasing costs and prices all along the line—from the farmer and manufacturer to the retailer and consumer, sharply boosting the price of homes, mortgage payments and rents.

"As builders' loan costs and mortgage rates soared, homebuilders began to postpone construction. State, county and municipal governments put off some of their planned building of hospitals, schools, roads and public buildings."

Since 1961, the nation had been moving gradually towards the goal of full employment. Both the public and private sectors of the economy grew at a pace fast enough to absorb new entrants into the labor force and make jobs for many of the unemployed.

But, the council report stressed, "a disproportionately large share of the gains of the long economic expansion went to business and wealthy families."

Most wage-earners and salaried workers received only modest increases in real wages. "And a small, declining, but significant group of Americans—the most disadvantaged, with the least skill, education and training—remained outside of the economy's mainstream, with persistent unemployment and part-time, low-wage jobs."

There was hope for bringing these hard-core jobless into the economic mainstream, the council report noted, with an array of federally-financed training and manpower development programs.

The council report comments:

"Though sometimes hesitant and usually under-funded, these new programs—within the framework of expanding job opportunities—helped to bring employment gains to many of the long-term unemployed and unskilled members of minority groups. By 1968, after seven years of economic expansion, unemployment was down to 3.6 percent of the labor force. This was the lowest jobless level in 15 years—but still some distance from the 2.9 percent unemployment rate of 1953."

During this period, black workers and other minority groups made substantial gains in both employment and income. The non-white unemployment rate for adult men dropped from 9.6 percent in 1960 to 3.9 percent in 1968. The income gap between white and non-white families remained substantial, but it steadily narrowed.

Only among the unskilled youth was there no improvement during this period.

To continue this progress, to wipe out the gap, there must be continuing expansion of employment opportunities, the council asserted.

But slamming the brakes on the economy—in a heavy-footed effort to curb inflation—would do more harm than good, the council cautioned.

"It would increase unemployment . . . and those workers with the least skill and work experience—non-whites and young people—would be hit hardest."

The Key: Jobs

The council reiterated labor's belief that "federal expenditures, tax and monetary policy must be geared to maximum expansion of job opportunities."

It called for a federally-financed public service employment program which would combine jobs for those who can not be absorbed into the private economy with providing the public services urgently needed in both urban and rural areas.

Instead of being halted, "the economic advances of the 1960s must be strengthened and extended."

The report spelled out areas of government action that can and should be taken to curb excess profits and inflation encouraged by existing tax benefits. But it emphasized that "a reduction of price pressures can—and must—be achieved without a growing army of unemployed."

The Executive Council pledged the AFL-CIO's cooperation any time the President of the United States determines that government controls are necessary to stabilize the economy.

The one requirement on which labor insists, the council reiterated, is that "such restraints are equitably placed" on "all prices, profits, dividends, rents and executive compensation, as well as employes' wages and salaries."

"We are prepared to sacrifice," the council said on behalf of more than 13 million union members, "so long as there is equality of sacrifice."

If workers' wages are to be controlled, so must the salaries of executives and the prices workers must pay for what they buy and rent.

In the long range, the council report noted, there must be "an improved balance among groups in the economy."

Government tax policies should be aimed at achieving "a fair distribution of the tax burden, based on ability to pay."

To accomplish this, the council said:

- Tax loopholes of special privilege for wealthy families and businesses should be closed.
- The poor should be removed from the income tax rolls.
- The relative tax burden on middle- and moderate-income families should be reduced.

Funding Gap Retards Advances in Education

Atlantic City—The crisis in public education persists despite substantial progress in some areas, the Executive Council declared.

Behind the headlines of campus unrest and inner city school problems with racial overtones, the country's educational system suffers from the lack of proper funds.

And although the federal government has increased its aid to states, the needs have far out-distanced congressional appropriations.

These piecemeal efforts, the Executive Council observes, have been grossly inadequate to provide solutions to the vast, complex problems now arising in the major cities and rural communities.

Full funding of federal education programs remains as the key answer to the crisis, the council said. The AFL-CIO continues to press for this goal along with the Teachers union and other educational organizations.

Elementary and secondary schools, despite their problems, have received substantial federal aid to enable many local systems to survive. The federation urged Congress to extend the Elementary & Secondary Education Act another five years and to maintain the hard-won formula for allocating funds, especially under Title I, to aid economically deprived children.

Problems on the college level for the children of workers have intensified as interest rates climbed. With interest rates at the highest levels in history, banks are now discouraging student loans.

The Executive Council also expressed concern over the indicated slowdown in school integration by the Nixon Administration. "American labor agreed," the council said, "that to further perpetuate the long-standing injustice to America's black community is intolerable."

In the area of vocational education, the 90th Congress took bold legislative steps last year. But this accomplishment also was dimmed by the gap between authorizations and appropriations, the council said.

Provisions of the Vocational Education Amendments of 1968 are designed to give new direction to the whole field of preparing people for a meaningful occupation—students in secondary and post-secondary schools, adults, unemployed workers, persons with special education needs and the handicapped.

Congress authorized $865 million for fiscal year 1970, which is an increase of $583 million over the $282 million provided in all vocational education laws prior to the 1968 amendments.

The Executive Council said the AFL-CIO protested vigorously when the Administration's budget called for only $288 million to be spent on vocational education in 1970. It is strongly urging Congress to provide full funds for the program.

Educational programs for trade union leadership were furthered with the opening of the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center on Labor Day.

The center was established following a comprehensive feasibility study authorized at the 1967 federation convention.

The first session at the institute will begin Dec. 1. In its initial stages, the center's programs will be devoted to full-time officials and staff of national and international unions. The three-week courses for union members will cover a number of pertinent subjects, including the American system of unionism, economics, American social studies and effective reading.

Labor Prods Campaign On Job Safety Standards

Atlantic City—Labor has helped focus national attention on "the long neglected issue of a safe work environment," the Executive Council reported to the AFL-CIO convention.

The council cited the AFL-CIO's continued stress on the need for government programs to reduce the "mounting toll" of job-related deaths, injuries and illnesses.

Although Pres. Johnson's proposal in the 90th Congress for federal health and safety standards did not pass, the council noted, it marked the "first time in American history" that there was a strong campaign for such legislation.

Further, the council said, similar legislation has been introduced in the 91st Congress and labor is determined to battle for it until a strong occupational safety and health law is enacted.

The report also traced labor's role in pushing for a gas and pipeline safety bill and a measure to require new safeguards against harmful radiation from television sets.

Legislation in both areas was enacted in the 90th Congress. Labor is still waiting for representation on a Gas Pipeline Safety Advisory Committee. It has representatives on an advisory committee set up under the Electronic Product Radiation Act of 1968.

Passage of a labor-backed construction safety bill earlier this year and increasing pressures for coal mine safety legislation were cited by the council as further evidence of the growing concern over workers' safety.

Elsewhere, the report described labor's successful efforts to secure stronger safety standards under the Walsh-Healey Act governing federally contracted projects and the "framework of a record-keeping system" covering radiation exposure of workers in atomic industries.

The council pointed to "broader participation" by the AFL-CIO and its affiliates in the activities of the National Safety Council and the American Standards Institute.

The increased participation, it observed, is in part due to dissatisfaction over the attitude of the NSC's executive board toward occupational safety and health legislation and the ASI's failure to meet the need for revised safety standards.

The council also reported that unions have placed "increased emphasis" on safety and health at the plant level by developing safety education programs and stepping up negotiations for health and safety clauses in contracts.

N.Y. Probation Officers Vote to Join SEIU

New York—The Probation & Parole Officers Association of Greater New York City, a 650-member unit, has voted to affiliate with the Service Employes Union in an election tabulated by the Honest Ballot Association.

Full Affiliation Pressed For Union Locals

Atlantic City—Continued progress toward the goal of full affiliation of all local unions with AFL-CIO state and local central bodies was reported by the Executive Council to the federation's eighth convention here.

Nevertheless, the council cited the failure of too many locals to enter such affiliation despite special efforts by the office of the AFL-CIO Coordinator of State & Local Central Bodies. These efforts have included periodic surveys, appeals to national and international unions concerning their unaffiliated locals, supplying of names and addresses of unaffiliated locals to the central bodies and a special pamphlet on the role and function of the central bodies.

The council's report urged special emphasis on strengthening local central bodies, because, it said, "in a very real sense" they are the "grass roots" of the labor movement in terms of legislative, political and social action and occupy "a strategic position in the relation of labor to the community."

The report noted the great range in size among local central bodies. Only about 10 percent of them have 20,000 members or more and 65 percent have fewer than 5,000 members. On the other hand, about 20 local central bodies are larger than half the state central bodies.

Communist Imperialism Seen Posing Growing Threat to World Peace

Atlantic City—Threats to world peace have not lessened in the two years since the last AFL-CIO convention, the Executive Council emphasized in a report to the 1967 convention.

In fact, the council added, the dangers are perhaps greater today than they were when the 1965 convention expressed "grave concern" over the international picture.

This is how the report described three major trouble spots:

Viet Nam—The war continues in spite of Paris peace negotiations. North Viet Nam clings to its plan for a "Communist takeover" of South Viet Nam, even though two of Hanoi's demands have been met.

The United States has halted the bombing of the North and the Saigon government has offered a plan for the National Liberation Front to participate in free elections under international supervision.

The Communists "refuse to negotiate in good faith," hoping that the American people will weary of the war and its demands, and all U.S. troops will be withdrawn.

Meanwhile, Hanoi relentlessly fights on with "wholehearted support" of world communism, "especially the Soviet Union without whose arms deliveries the North's aggression would be impossible."

The Middle East—The crisis has worsened due to increased Arab guerilla attacks against Israel. "Nasser and his partners among the Arab governments are less inclined than ever before to agree to a just and lasting political settlement with Israel."

The Arabs are able to maintain "their intransigent and belligerent attitude" because of the economic and diplomatic support they are receiving from Russia.

Peace efforts, too, are set back because the USSR backs the Arabs' refusal to negotiate with Israel. The Soviets have strengthened their political and military power in the Middle East. They are increasingly building up their Navy in the Mediterranean.

Czechoslovakia—The Soviet invasion in August 1968 provided "the most dramatic demonstration of Moscow's fear of even the slightest concessions to freedom behind the Iron Curtain."

The "brutal" aggression stirred indignation and protest around the world. Free trade unions joined in condemning the invasion. Many of them broke off previously planned contacts with the "unions" of the invading powers.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany denounced the invasion as a violation of "every principle of human decency" and called upon the United Nations to act upon the attack against the Czechoslovak people.

The council has urged the full suspension by the United States of cultural exchange programs with Soviet bloc countries; UN sanctions against Russia until all Soviet troops have left Czechoslovak soil and the "status quo" has been restored; and American and UN aid to Czechoslovak refugees.

In other areas, the report describes further threats from Moscow against West Berlin and West Germany; continued dictatorships in Spain and Portugal; control of Greece by a military junta that "shows no intention of restoring constitutional rule."

No Soviet Softening

The council noted worsening relations between Communist China and Russia but warned that "it would be self-deceptive and futile" to expect that this will cause the Soviet government to "soften" its attitude toward the West.

It hailed Africa's "further progress on the thorny path of nation-building." However, it observed that the cause of African democracy and free unions "suffered a grievous loss" when Tom Mboya, a chief architect of Kenya's independence, was assassinated.

The report noted the failure of Cuba's Castro to spread his Communist subversion in Latin America. But it voiced alarm at the growing number of military dictatorships in that part of the western hemisphere.

The "somber" picture around the globe, the council said, has been further darkened by growing "neo-isolationism" in the United States, insistent demands for troop withdrawals from Asia and Europe, and calls for a reduction in U.S. commitments abroad.

"This reluctance to shoulder further the responsibility of international leadership not only endangers our own national security but also jeopardizes world peace and freedom," the report said.

The council described AFL-CIO's extensive participation in the American Institute for Free Labor Development, the African-American Labor Center and the Asian-American Free Labor Institute—programs to assist unions and democracy in Latin America, Africa and Asia.

These programs, the council said, "have shown increasing effectiveness" in aiding the growth of free unions and democracy "as well as advancing the economy of developing nations."

The AFL-CIO "remains loyal to the ideals" of strengthening free unions which led to the founding of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, even though the federation was forced to withdraw from the organization earlier this year, the council said.

The report charged ICFTU had become ineffective for three reasons: (1) its refusal to push for membership compliance with its own ban against exchanges with "so-called unions" in dictator nations, (2) its campaign against national trade union centers, and (3) continuous aid given by some top ICFTU officials to the Auto Workers efforts to become an ICFTU affiliate even though such affiliation would bring "destructive factionalism" into the world labor body.

The council reiterated the federation's willingness to enter into talks toward reaffiliation with the ICFTU providing such discussions are conducted "in the light of the reasons which led to our withdrawal."

Council Asks 'No Retreat':

Civil Rights Drive Shifts to New Area

Atlantic City—The battle to end segregation and discrimination has moved into more complex and difficult areas, but it must continue without letup, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said in its report to the convention.

The responsibility for further action has also shifted, the council said. "The role of the executive branch becomes all the more crucial now that most of the basic legislation is on the books," it stressed.

Citing the dangers of growing polarization between the white and black communities, the council said "there should be no retreat or compromise in eliminating discrimination.

"To the degree that black rage and white fear lead to further polarization and away from further progress toward the democratic process in eleminating discrimination and poverty, the health and viability of the entire society is jeopardized," it warned.

"The reason for frustration is not hard to find," the report said. "The 1960s were, for Americans, a period of rising standards of living, if not of affluence. This included many minority group citizens. Since discrimination was a major factor in the gap between non-whites and the rest of the population, the passage of the civil rights laws and the ensuing reduction in discrimination raised expectations.

"The expectations were that Negroes and other non-whites would immediately move up the economic ladder into the mainstream of American society," the council continued.

It warned that "the problem of ending deprivation and poverty is more complex than eliminating discrimination, and even discrimination is not ended merely by passing laws.

"Effective solutions to the problems involve expenditures of larger sums of money and resources," the report said.

In reciting the gains made over the last 15 years, the council also pointed out the actions needed to continue the job.

Three voting rights laws and the efforts of civil rights, labor and other groups have raised the level of Negro voting in the South, the report said, but black registration still lags behind the white level.

In 1968, 57.2 percent of the eligible Negroes in the South voted, compared to only 35.5 percent in 1964. One result has been the election of 450 Negroes to office, to only 70 four years ago. The report termed it a matter of "prime importance" that Congress extend the section of the 1965 Voting Rights Act which bans literacy tests.

School integration is an area of less progress and more complexity, the council noted. In July 1969, only 20 percent of the Negro children went to integrated schools in the South. This is an improvement over the one percent of 10 years ago and the council credited the progress to more vigorous implementation of Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

However, the fact that 80 percent of the children are still in inferior, segregated schools indicates the elimination of the dual system cannot be accomplished with "all deliberate speed. What is needed is full speed ahead, not further compromise," the council said.

Equal access to housing is another area in which the nation is lagging behind, the council said. "It is questionable whether we are even winning the battle to stop the increasing segregation in our major urban centers," the council added.

Significant advances have been made in affording equal employment opportunity, the report said, and this has resulted in the median income for non-whites being raised 10 percent in the last 10 years. However, that income rate is still only 62% of the white rate, the council noted.

Negro unemployment, still twice that of the white rate, indicates the need for such programs as the O'Hara bill and such new directions as indicated in the A. Philip Randolph Freedom Budget, the council said.

The report also cited progress in eliminating discrimination within the labor movement, including the abolition of virtually all of the segregated locals which existed in 1957.

Similarly, the report pointed out the accomplishments of apprenticeship Outreach programs. With the help of such programs, Dept. of Labor apprenticeship figures show that in 1968, 7.2 percent of the nation's apprentices were non-white and of the 26,156 apprentices newly enrolled in 1968, approximately 9.4 percent came from minority groups.

Workers Hurt by Rising Imports, Foreign Operations of U.S. Firms

Atlantic City—Changes in world trade over the past two years have created new problems and worsened some existing ones, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

It cited a "sharp rise" in direct investment by U.S. firms in foreign subsidiaries, factories, sales agencies and other facilities as causing "a large shift of production to other countries."

Multi-national firms with U.S. headquarters "but without responsibility to the United States" have become increasingly important in world trade, with the ability to manipulate production, sales, imports and exports almost at will, the council said.

In addition, it noted, "some of America's trading partners, among the industrial countries, have progressed more rapidly than the United States in developing and extending their prowess in world markets."

These changes, along with changes in the economy, contributed to the nation's trade surplus of exports over imports reaching a low-point of only $750 million in 1968, the council said. "No prospects for a substantial improvement have appeared in the first half of 1969," it added.

While many of the growing imports were needed for U.S. production and economic expansion, the council said, "it was clear that American workers were adversely affected by a portion of these sharply rising imports."

The report listed imports creating problems for U.S. workers in such industries as steel, footwear, auto, clothing, electronics, glass, ceramic tile, toys and leather goods.

The council deplored the failure of the U.S. government "to stop its encouragement" of the so-called U.S.-Mexican Border Development Program.

This "exploitive program," the AFL-CIO leaders said, sees U.S. firms fleeing to Mexico to take advantage of cheap labor and U.S. trade laws to ship products back into the United States to the detriment of American workers.

In line with a resolution adopted by the 1967 AFL-CIO convention, the council said, the federation "has continuously pressed for adequate solutions to the many-sided problems from world trade as it affected the interests of workers."

It pointed to "constant communications" with government agencies and repeated testimony by the AFL-CIO and affiliates before Congress in advancing labor's concern.

In 1970 Elections:

Liberals in Congress Face Stiff Challenge

Atlantic City—A strong challenge to liberal members of the House and Senate can be expected in the 1970 elections, the AFL-CIO Executive Council warned in its report to the convention.

Additionally, the council noted that state legislative battles take on increased significance next year because the legislatures elected then will set new congressional boundaries in line with the 1970 census.

"Should conservatives gain control of the state legislatures," the report observed, "they could thus determine the tone of the U.S. House for the next decade."

The council called particular attention to the "marginal" seats in Congress—those carried with 55 percent of the vote or less and those which switched parties the last time they were contested.

A total of 78 House seats are in this category, of which the Democrats now hold 48 and the Republicans 30. On the Senate side, only 10 Republicans face re-election contests against 25 Democrats, the council noted.

It focused on 21 of these Senate seats now held by liberals, many of whom face stiff challenges. It listed among those who won marginally six years ago such Democrats as Senators Vance Hartke (Ind.), Howard Cannon (Nev.), Joseph Montoya (N.M.), Stephen Young (Ohio), Albert Gore (Tenn.), William Proxmire (Wis.) and Gale McGee (Wyo.). Additionally, the report observed that Sen. Yarborough (Tex.) "habitually confronts strong opposition" and that his contest is particularly important because of his position as chairman of the Senate Labor Committee.

Against this outlook, the council gave an extensive review of labor's political performance in the 1968 presidential and congressional elections, with a detailed summary of the operations of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

The effectiveness of labor's 1968 effort, the council observed, can best be measured by the thin margin by which Pres. Nixon defeated former Vice Pres. Humphrey despite the severe handicaps the latter encountered.

"Two factors came through clearly during the campaign and on election day," the report said:

- "The labor movement established itself more than in any previous presidential election as a major factor in American politics.
- "Union members listen when presented with factual, effective materials in a political campaign. This was underscored by the turnaround in the Wallace sentiment within union ranks and by the strong support given Humphrey on election day by union members."

The AFL-CIO, the council recalled, had become involved in the campaign "to an unprecedented degree, starting with the formation of the Labor Committee for Humphrey after Pres. Johnson announced that he would not seek re-election."

Labor's efforts in the election, the report said, included the assignment of special COPE coordinators in 16 states, registration drives that added 4.6 million voters to the election rolls, get-out-the-vote drives in 35 states and the District of Columbia, conferences to mobilize Negro and Spanish-speaking trade unionists, and the distribution of more than 60 million pieces of campaign literature and other material.

The results, the council noted, led the Wall Street Journal to observe just after the election that "organized labor is alive and well, after all" and could "sway its members, mount a mammoth campaign against strong opposition and poor odds to come within a millimeter of total victory."

Weaver Appointed Aide to ILO Chief

Geneva—George L-P Weaver, former Assistant Sec. of Labor for International Affairs, has begun a new assignment as special assistant to Dir. Gen. David A. Morse of the International Labor Organization.

The ILO said Weaver will be based in Washington, D.C. where he will handle its relations with U.S. government agencies. He also will function as Morse's roving representative.

Weaver was appointed an Assistant Sec. of Labor by Pres. Kennedy in 1961 and served in that role during the Johnson Administration. He remained in the Labor Dept. under the Nixon Administration long enough to head the U.S. government delegation to the ILO conference in June.

Weaver was executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee following the merger and later an assistant to the president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. He was worker adviser to 1957 and 1958 ILO conferences, and in 1968 was elected chairman of the ILO's governing body.

10-Cent Per Capita Tax, Expanded Council Sought

Atlantic City—The eighth AFL-CIO convention will act on two constitutional amendments submitted by the Executive Council. One calls for an increase in the number of federation vice presidents from 27 to 33, and the other proposes an increase in the per capita tax paid by affiliates from 7 cents a month to 10 cents.

The council, in its report to the delegates, said expansion of the number of vice presidencies would enable the federation "to recognize new areas of real or potential growth and significance in the development of trade unionism, and to extend to a wider segment of the leadership of affiliated unions the opportunity for greater service to the membership of the labor movement at large."

The proposed increase in per capita tax was based on the recommendations of a council subcommittee set up to project AFL-CIO expenses over the coming years with special attention to increased expenses growing out of the AFL-CIO Voter Registration Fund and the new National Labor Studies Center.

Higher Living Costs Threaten Gains Won at Bargaining Table

Atlantic City—Union bargaining committees achieved sizable gains in wages and fringe benefits in the past two years, but a considerable part of the buying power that resulted from contract improvements was swallowed up by rising living costs, the AFL-CIO Executive Council reported.

Consumer prices accelerated from a rise of nearly 3 percent in 1967 to more than 4 percent in 1968. In early 1969, the government's Consumer Price Index rose at a yearly rate of 5 to 5.5 percent.

Union contracts gains were made in the face of strong employer opposition, the report said.

Over the two-year period, strikes and the number of workers involved rose to the highest levels of the 1960s, although well below the peaks of the early post-World War II years. In copper, for example, workers were on strike for 10 months or more "to secure a decent contract."

The council noted that unions, in trying to meet the pressures of increased living costs and to achieve some gains in buying power, have been winning larger wage increases and have extended escalator clauses in agreements tied to the price index.

Major settlements—those covering 1,000 or more workers—in 1967 nailed down first-year wage gains of 5.6 percent and, over the life of the contract, averaged annual wage hikes of 5 percent.

In 1968, first-year wage increases totaled 7.2 percent and, over the full contract term, averaged 5.2 percent. Reported settlements in early 1969 called for "somewhat greater" average wage hikes than in the previous year, the report said.

It listed continued improvements in pensions, health and welfare benefits, paid vacations, holidays, supplemental unemployment benefits and reduced working hours.

Pension gains included new survivors' benefits, higher retirement benefits, earlier retirement, reduced vesting requirements and some portability of pension credits for workers who move to another job.

In many agreements, retirement benefits were increased to a range of $5-$6.50 a month per year of service.

The council noted a continued trend toward reducing the retirement age to 60 or 62, and some contracts provided for retirement after 20 or 30 years of service regardless of age.

Bargaining on health and welfare plans emphasized improvements in benefits, expansion of coverage to include dependents of retirees, and further integration of health benefits with Medicare. In many contracts, health care was expanded to include dental and eye care, mental health, illness due to alcoholism and allowances for prescription drugs.

Prepaid group health plans continued to get attention from union negotiators. Five- and six-week vacations for long-service employes continued to spread, with provisions in some pacts for a seventh or eighth week. Two new features are vacation cash bonuses and mini-vacations between Christmas and New Year's.

The number of paid holidays in union contracts continued to expand, with many agreements providing 10 to 12 paid days. Improvements in supplemental jobless benefits provided larger benefits for longer periods, the council noted.

SUB plans and savings plans have spread, the report said, to segments of the construction industry.

Other improvements included better job security through work guarantees, better attrition plans, new training programs, increased severance pay provisions and shorter hours of work.

A guarantee of a full year's work was negotiated for experienced Longshoremen in New York and some other ports. The trend toward 37.5-hour or 35-hour weeks was noted in some contracts in construction, printing, tobacco, maritime, broadcasting and some manufacturing industries, the council said.

Farm Workers Drive Still Key Labor Effort

Atlantic City—The AFL-CIO's greatest sustained organizational effort continues to be assistance to the organizing and table grape boycott campaigns of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, the Executive Council reported here.

The 1967 convention called for all-out support by all AFL-CIO union members for "these heroic unionists in all their organizational endeavors."

A key tactic has been the national boycott against all California table grapes. This move was made necessary, the council said, because of collusion among grape growers and shippers as so-called competitors were exchanging labels and trademarks "to camouflage shipments, confuse the boycotters and frustrate their efforts."

Farm workers and their families began traveling cross-country in caravans, averaging 500 miles a day, with meals and lodging arranged in advance by AFL-CIO staff personnel and usually paid for by unions. That support is continuing as the boycott campaign spreads —in 40 U.S. cities, and in Toronto and Montreal.

UFWOC has a boycott operation in England and Sweden where at the request of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, the labor movements are cooperating. In South America, assistance is being developed with the aid of the federation's Dept. of International Affairs.

The farm workers got a counter-blow last November when the DiGiorgio Corp. sold the 7,000-acre King Ranch in Arvin, Calif., where UFWOC had won representation rights two years earlier, and the 5,000-acre Sierra Vista Ranch at Delano. Most of the land has been sold to companies already under boycott.

On the brighter side, the union reported it has made satisfying progress in 10 wine-grape contracts previously won and now up for renegotiation or automatic renewal. They provide hourly wage minimums of $2 and minimum guarantees of more than $3 an hour for incentive workers, plus other benefits. Contracts are with Almaden, Paul Masson, Christian Brothers, Gallo, Novitiate, Franzia, Perelli-Minetti and Schenley companies.

The council said "unfair and outdated immigration policies and weak, ineffective enforcement procedures all along the southern U.S. border continue to plague farm worker organizing efforts."

Human Resources Units Functioning in 50 Cities

Atlantic City—The Human Resources Development Institute—the manpower arm of the AFL-CIO—is tackling the problems of disadvantaged workers in their quest for economic opportunities, the Executive Council reported to the convention.

Established little more than a year ago, HRDI has operations in 50 major metropolitan centers across the country and is still growing.

Soon after its founding, HRDI went to work with a $1.5 million Labor Dept. contract helping to execute federal manpower programs and policies.

The problems of the under-employed, the under-skilled, the disadvantaged and victims of discrimination are among the chief concerns of the institute.

HRDI is designed to use and further develop the resources and skills in the labor movement in the operation of manpower programs, the council noted.

It is involved in programs to prepare minority youth for apprenticeships and to assist hard-core unemployed or under-skilled workers upgrade their job abilities.

It also functions as the liaison between labor and various government and private programs in the manpower field.

Before HRDI, the Executive Council noted, there was a lack of labor's direct involvement in training programs although there were many in its ranks who were knowledgeable in operations of manpower programs.

As a first step, HRDI carried out an intensive training program for its own staff at national and regional training meetings.

HRDI also teamed up with the National Alliance of Businessmen to expand the JOBS program (Job Opportunities in the Business Sector).

It later took over the Buddy Programs which aid the newly hired disadvantaged worker to adapt to the job and ease early employment problems.

While HRDI will assist and support current manpower programs, it will also help AFL-CIO unions to design and sponsor manpower programs of their own.

The Executive Council pointed out that the institute staff has the technical skill and knowledge to help unions in developing training proposals and negotiating with Labor Dept.'s Manpower Administration to obtain needed funds.

HRDI is also committed to work with local Model Cities administrators and with the building trades unions to recruit, counsel and train inner city residents involved in neighborhood rehabilitation and new construction.

Community Services Expands Operations

The AFL-CIO is expanding its Community Services Activities to seven more localities with the addition of new full-time representatives. With the expansion, the CSA department will serve 113 communities with 167 representatives.

The new AFL-CIO representatives will work on the staffs of United Funds in Lorain, Mansfield and Springfield, Ohio; Norfolk, Va., Marion, Ind.; Tampa, Fla., and Lincoln, Neb.

More Locals Affiliate With Internationals

Atlantic City—The trend toward affiliation of directly chartered local unions into national or international unions continued in the past two years, the Executive Council's report to the convention revealed.

As of last June 30, the AFL-CIO had 187 directly affiliated locals with 53,300 members. This represented a decline from 219 such locals on July 1, 1967, and a drop in total membership from 56,200.

The council reported that during the period, 26 locals with 3,610 members chose to affiliate with national or international unions because of a desire by the members for active participation in the affairs of a national union with similar activities and jurisdiction.

Five of the direct affiliates with a combined membership of 72 disbanded during the period and the charters of two others with 71 members were revoked. One new local charter was issued.

The council also reported that all 50 states had state central bodies in operation and that 765 local central bodies were in existence as of June 30.

Joint Fund Aids Housing, Gains Income

Atlantic City — The AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust is now bringing a greater yield for participating unions while making more funds available for housing construction, the Executive Council reported.

From the beginning, the trust was devised to pool investments of union reserves for use in socially desirable union-built housing programs.

Share in Net Gains

As an approved lender for FHA and VA guaranteed loans, the trust accepts investments from AFL-CIO affiliates and qualified labor-management pension, welfare and retirement plans. The participants share in the net income from the loans and mortgages owned by the trust.

Currently the return on investments is yielding about 7 percent as the FHA interest rate has climbed consistently in recent years.

But "we look upon this rise with mixed feelings because it represents inflation and because it means that fewer low- and moderate-income families will receive housing," the council said.

"Our objective is not to receive absolute top dollar but rather to get safe, reasonable rate of return and to provide housing for lower-income families."

Following the passage of the Housing Act of 1968, the federation ordered a restructuring and expansion of the trust. A campaign was launched to attract more affiliates as investors in the trust stressing a reasonable rate of return combined with actuarial soundness.

One of the great advantages of the trust is that the investors are not tied to individual mortgages and therefore are afforded considerable liquidity, the council pointed out.

The trust also provides for planning local building projects of participating affiliates should they undertake such projects alone or with other local unions.

The trust has made loans recently for low- and moderate-income multi-family FHA projects in St. Louis, Washington, D. C., New York and Pittsburgh. Additional loans are under consideration for Los Angeles, Baltimore, Boston, Gary, Ind., and a number of other cities.

Crisis in Cities:

Urban Report Cites Housing Slowdown

Atlantic City—Complacency toward the crisis in America's cities could lead to national disaster, the Executive Council reported to the federation's convention, and housing is one of the keys to easing that crisis.

The council called for a national goal of 3 million units of new and rehabilitated housing each year as part of a multi-pronged attack on the poverty pockets in America's major cities.

"There are no instant solutions for the complex of problems that are at the root of America's urban crisis," the report said. "No city or state government or private group, working in isolation, can solve these problems. Nationwide, federal programs are needed—planned measures over the next decade or two—to revitalize the fabric of American society."

Besides correcting the critical shortage of housing, especially for middle- and lower-income groups, the council's report called for:

- A federally-financed, public service employment program in which the government is the employer of last resort.
- Extension of the Fair Labor Standards Act to all workers, with the legal minimum wage increased to $2 an hour.
- Improvement and updating of the work-related unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation systems, with adequate federal standards.
- A 50 percent increase in social security benefits, with federal financial contributions in addition to those made by employes and employers.
- A thorough restructuring of the public welfare assistance, based on need alone, with adequate federal standards.
- Adoption of a comprehensive national health-insurance program.
- Accelerated construction of public facilities to guarantee clean air and water as well as sewage systems, mass transit, schools, hospitals, day care centers and playgrounds.
- Effective enforcement of equal opportunity laws.
- Closing the educational gap between privileged and underprivileged.

To attain such goals, the council reaffirmed support of the Office of Economic Opportunity and decried the curtailment of the Job Corps program.

It said "the retention of OEO as the 'command post' for the anti-poverty effort is important as a visible symbol to the poor. But it is also important as a defender and practitioner of the principle of citizen participation.

"Unfortunately, in the past OEO programs have been consistently underfunded," the report said.

In repeating labor's objections to the closing of 50 Job Corps centers, the report said: "Fortunately, it was possible to arrange to use some of the remaining Job Corps centers for union-sponsored training programs, so that today there are about 1,100 involved in the conservation center training programs under union auspices."

The report also cited the work of the Urban Coalition—and OEO's community action programs, to which "the AFL-CIO at all levels, national, state and local, has given solid support."

In tracing the background of the nation's critical shortage of housing for lower- and middle-income groups, the council blamed soaring land prices, rising interest rates and the increased concentration on building luxury private homes and high-rise apartments.

This trend has led to an estimate by a national home builders' group that the average U.S. house now costs $26,000, the report said. "The same study shows that housing serving families with incomes of $5,000 or less and selling under $12,500 fell from 5 percent of total housing constructed in the last quarter of 1967 to an insignificant 2 percent in the last quarter of 1968."

Yet there are still 25.4 million Americans with incomes under the government-defined poverty level of $3,550 a year for a family of four.

"And the government-defined poor, as well as the near-poor—particularly among Negroes—were increasingly concentrated in the central cities of the nation," the council said in pointing out that the least housing is being constructed in the areas where it is needed most desperately.

Merger Action Unites 12 AFL-CIO Unions

Atlantic City—Twelve AFL-CIO unions were involved in mergers over the past two years, the federation's Executive Council reported to the convention.

The merger affecting the most members—about 420,000—united the Meat Cutters and the Packinghouse Workers, retaining the name of the former.

Four railroad industry unions merged into one with a combined membership of about 150,000. They were the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, Railway Trainmen, Switchmen, and Conductors & Brakemen. The merged organization is known as the United Transportation Union.

The Laborers merged with the Journeymen Stonecutters and also with the Post Office Mail Handlers, keeping the title of the Laborers.

The Railway, Airline & Steamship Clerks also figured in two mergers—one with the Railway Patrolmen and the other with the Transportation-Communication Employes—with the Clerks' name retained.

In all cases, the council noted, merger was approved with the understanding that the resulting jurisdiction would be no less than the jurisdictions of the organizations before merger.

The council also reported on the suspension of the Auto Workers on May 15, 1968, for failure to pay the union's per capita tax, and on the UAW's subsequent disaffiliation.

A copy of the special report on the UAW case, titled "To Clear the Record," was distributed to all convention delegates as a supplement to the Executive Council report.

has the ability to solve seemingly impossible problems . . . it needs only a national will. . . ."

Meany defined the new emerging "environmental dangers" of our times as the "least excusable of all" and called for programs to solve these man-made problems.

Sec.-Treas. Kirkland's financial and membership report disclosed that the average AFL-CIO membership for the two-year period ending June 30, 1969 was 13,005,000. The comparable 1967 convention figure was 13,781,000, including 1,325,000 for the Auto Workers, since disaffiliated. Deduction of this figure shows that the federation gained 549,000 members in the two-year period.

The financial report showed that the federation's net worth declined $383,882 to a total of $9,072,048, the decline attributable to an excess of expenses over income.

The section on developments in the labor movement notes mergers involving 12 international unions since the last convention, mergers involving some 1.2 million members. It reports also on the suspension and disaffiliation of the Auto Workers and makes the report on the UAW case "To Clear the Record" a part of its own report to the convention.

Discussing organizing activities the council notes the increase in employer resistance and their development of new tactics to avoid bargaining responsibilities. Despite these campaigns AFL-CIO unions won 53.4 percent of the NLRB elections they participated in over 23 months and added 359,499 workers to union rolls.

The organizing campaigns of the farm workers and the long, bitter grape strike were reviewed and continuing, strong council support noted and reaffirmed.

In a detailed analysis of the nation's economy, the council report scored the government's policies as ineffective in the fight against inflation and warned that record-breaking interest rates and rising unemployment, along with an overall slowdown in the economy, could bring on a recession.

The economic section detailed also how a large share of the economic gains since early 1961 have gone to business and wealthy families while improvements in wages and salaries lagged far behind.

The current economic imbalance, the council warned, has brought strains in collective bargaining as workers seek to improve their buying power and consumer prices, keyed to a profits boom, keep rising at a yearly rate of over 5 percent.

In the social security area the council reviewed the developments in various programs and said that a national health insurance system is essential, keyed to the existing social security system, with contributions by workers, employers and the government to provide for comprehensive benefits without deductibles or co-insurance.

The council reviewed the federation's housing and urban affairs programs, noting the creation of the Human Resources Development Institute with programs under way in major cities. It renewed its call for programs of 3 million units of new and rehabilitated housing annually.

The report called on affiliates to participate in the federation's Mortgage Investment Trust Fund to help supply construction loan and mortgage money to aid in meeting the housing crisis.

In its section on international affairs the council reviewed AFL-CIO positions on Viet Nam, the Middle East, Soviet aggression in Czechoslovakia and developments in other European nations.

It reported on federation programs to aid workers and unions in Latin America, Africa and Asia, cited the circumstances of the AFL-CIO departure from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and on relationships with the International Labor Organization.

The problems of international trade and the specific problems of the Mexican Border Industrialization Program are discussed in this section.

The council's report deals with developments in the area of civil rights with major stress on the implementation by the Administration of the legislation adopted in the past few years.

The report reviews the apprenticeship Outreach programs which have placed more than 3,000 non-white apprentices in 52 programs by mid-1969 in cooperation with local building trades unions and cited Dept. of Labor reports showing considerable progress in expanding job opportunities for minority workers in the skilled trades.

Turning to labor and the law the report covers U.S. Supreme Court decisions which gave unions the right to picket at shopping centers during organizational campaigns, the right to set up and finance group legal service plans and other victories. Decisions of lower courts along with important cases before the NLRB also are reviewed here.

In an issue-by-issue review of national legislation, the council noted that despite the conservative mood of the second session of the 90th Congress, landmark measures in housing, civil rights and consumer protection were enacted since the last convention with strong labor support.

The productivity of the first session of the 91st has been very low, the report notes, with major issues still unsettled. Over 90 major legislative issues are reviewed.

A survey of labor legislation in the 50 states is included in the report with indications that substantial gains were recorded in a few states, but only modest progress in others.

In the section on political activities, the council reviewed the high effectiveness of the labor movement in the 1968 elections and focused attention on the 1970 elections where many liberal senators face stiff challenges and control of Congress and many state houses is at stake.

The report covered also the operations of the AFL-CIO's headquarters departments and the various constitutional departments. The latter's reports are prepared separately by each department and transmitted without action or comment to the convention.

Unions Win 16 of 22 Supreme Court Cases

Atlantic City—Labor won 75 percent of its cases before the Supreme Court during the last two years for a "highly successful" legal record, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

The council report dealt with 22 labor cases which reached the Supreme Court since the last convention—a period covering the final two court terms under Chief Justice Earl Warren. In 16 of these cases, labor's arguments prevailed.

Many of the cases dealt with constitutional issues and the council report discussed five of them, including three that it termed "major."

In Food Employees Local 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza, Pennsylvania courts ruled that peaceful picketing on shopping center sidewalks could be barred as an illegal trespass on private property, and the union appealed. The Supreme Court reversed the decision in a 6-3 vote.

Justice Marshall wrote an opinion concluding that state laws on the places at which picketing may be carried on are subject to the same constitutional freedom of speech standards historically applied to handbilling cases. Five other justices agreed, in a decision which the council said was "plainly of the greatest practical importance" for unions faced with the usual "formidable difficulties" in carrying on organizing campaigns.

In United Mine Workers v. Illinois Bar Association, the organized bar complained that the UMW engaged in the unauthorized practice of law by hiring a licensed attorney, on a salaried basis, to represent any member who wanted his advice in workmen's compensation claims. The Illinois courts rejected the union's claim that the plan was protected by the 1st Amendment. The Supreme Court reversed, with Justice Harlan dissenting. The council said:

"The court made it absolutely plain that unions have the right to set up and finance group legal service plans . . . as to any work-related matter, as long as the plan is administered in such a way as to insure that the individual member retains control of the case" involving him.

A landmark ruling was put on the lawbooks when Maryland and 27 other states brought a suit, called Maryland v. Wirtz, alleging that it was beyond the power of Congress to regulate the minimum wages and maximum hours of employes in state-operated hospitals and schools. The states' argument was "completely rejected" by a seven-man majority of the court, the council noted.

The opinion, written by Justice Harlan, upheld the power of Congress to regulate public enterprises affecting commerce.

The report said "There can be little doubt that this case represents a major interpretation of the commerce clause which will have reverberations far into the future if Congress moves to meet the serious labor relations problems which are surfacing on the state and local levels of government."

The council cited two cases of "lesser magnitude":

In Nash v. Florida Industrial Commission, the commission had refused to pay unemployment insurance to a union member because she had authorized her union to file unfair labor practice charges against her employer on her behalf. This refusal was upheld by the Florida courts but unanimously reversed by the Supreme Court.

The court, for the fourth time in 55 years, rejected the claim of a railroad — this time the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific—that Arkansas's state "full crew" laws violate the Constitution or the 14th Amendment. The court ruled that the evidence strongly supported the claim of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, now part of the United Transportation Union, that the laws play an important safety function.

National Labor Relations Board cases did not "occupy center stage" during the last two Warren terms, the council reported, but nevertheless did figure in decisions of importance.

In NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., a unanimous court ruled that an employer's duty to bargain with a union can be established without a representation election.

It said that authorization cards obtained by the union from a majority of employes, without misrepresentation or coercion, are reliable enough generally to prove a valid alternate route to majority status. It found that an order to bargain is justified when an employer "rejects a card majority while . . . committing unfair labor practices that tend to undermine the union's majority and make a fair election an unlikely possibility."

Internal Disputes Plan Sparks Cooperation

Atlantic City—The cooperation of affiliates and the competency of the mediators involved has helped make the AFL-CIO Internal Disputes Plan "most successful," the Executive Council reported.

The disputes plan, which is Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution, was adopted by the 1961 convention and went into effect the following Jan. 1. From its inception through the first eight months of 1969, the council reported, 918 cases have been filed under the plan, of which nearly 60 percent—533—were settled in mediation.

Many cases, the report noted, were settled on an informal basis by the parties after discussions with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's office.

A panel of officers of international unions handles the mediation of disputes, along with a panel of impartial umpires that includes David L. Cole, Philip Taft and Howard W. Kleeb. All members of the Executive Council serve on three-man subcommittees of the council that hear appeals and examine complaints of non-compliance.

The impartial umpires have made determinations in 350 cases and issued 14 fact-finding reports since the plan went into effect. Nine cases are now pending before umpires.

Appeals from the determinations of the umpires have been received by the council subcommittee in 113 cases. Of these, 91 were denied, 10 were withdrawn, eight were referred to the council and four are pending.

The subcommittee also received 61 complaints of non-compliance with umpires' determinations. It achieved compliance in 32 cases and found non-compliance in 16 others. Eight cases were withdrawn and five are pending.

The report noted that since the 1967 convention, non-compliance sanctions required under the Constitution have been removed for three unions. It listed the following unions as presently in non-compliance with the determinations of impartial umpires: the Air Line Pilots, National Maritime Union, Typographical Union, Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, Leather Goods, Plastics & Novelty Workers, and the Railway Carmen.

Ex-Goldwater Aide Gets FCC Post

Dean Burch, longtime aide to Sen. Barry Goldwater and a former Republican national chairman, has been nominated by Pres. Nixon to be chairman of the Federal Communications Commission.

Burch, 41-year-old Tucson, Ariz., lawyer, was a manager of Goldwater's 1964 presidential campaign and had earlier served as the senator's administrative assistant.

To fill another vacancy on the commission, Nixon chose a Kansas radio station executive, Robert Wells. Wells is part owner of a group of radio stations with newspaper links. The FCC regulates the broadcasting industry.

Meany Hits Cuts in Social Programs

Pledges No Retreat In Federation's Goals

struggle for equal rights for all people. He pointed to the progress of the Johnson years and the subsequent slowdown.

On Viet Nam, the federation president noted that "we are still fighting a very unpopular war" but that "it is fair to point out that this is not Mr. Nixon's war, any more than it was Mr. Eisenhower's, Mr. Kennedy's or Mr. Johnson's war."

Anxious for Peace

He said he believed Pres. Nixon was "just as anxious for a just peace in Viet Nam as were any of his predecessors," and warned that "those in high places in our governmental structure who advocate unilateral withdrawal are not in any way advancing the idea of a negotiated settlement. They are in fact encouraging those on the other side of the table not to negotiate on the very logical assumption that they can achieve their objective, control and domination over the people of South Viet Nam, by just sitting tight."

Turning to the Administration's policies on fighting inflation, including the highest interest rates in 100 years and cutbacks in various programs in education, water pollution and other areas, Meany declared that stripped of "pious platitudes and blatant baloney," the theory is quite simple. It means driving down the cost of living and increasing unemployment and also holding down the wage demands of those most in need of a decent standard of living.

Meany said the economic policies of the Administration have increased unemployment by more than 200,000 since Jan. 1, 1969, and those on part-time jobs by 300,000.

Tax Aid for Business

He reviewed in detail the struggle for tax justice and reform of the tax system and said the Administration's position, as presented to the Senate Finance Committee, was to refuse aid to middle-income people and give tax relief to big business.

The Administration position, he stressed, "would perpetuate the unfairness in some aspects of the tax structure and in other aspects they would compound this unfairness."

The AFL-CIO, he pledged, will continue its fight for tax justice in the Senate, but he noted that Washington is "crowded with well-heeled lobbyists who represent every group that has a selfish interest in perpetuating the special tax preference that they now enjoy."

In the area of civil rights, Meany pointed out the slowdown in enforcement "all down the line in schools, fair housing, voting rights and job rights where non-union southern employers are concerned," and the focusing "adversely on one segment of a single industry that has with all its force provided more high paid job opportunities for more members of minority groups than any other industry in the country—the building and construction trades industry."

Haynsworth Case

He reviewed in great detail the case developed against the confirmation of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., to the U.S. Supreme Court, declaring that "Judge Haynsworth's madcap pursuit of capital gains in his commercial and financial investments with special corporation pleaders before his bench are now matters of record."

Summarizing, Meany said that the past two years have been years of trial and trouble for the nation and the AFL-CIO and that the future "of our movement—its direction, its commitments—is irrevocably bound to the future of the society of which we are a part. Our movement is an integral part of the American scene. The progress of our nation, as well as its problems, are all part of our day-to-day concern and vital interest."

CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY Collective Bargaining Commission holds its first meeting with Pres. Nixon since he named its members Sept. 22. The 12 members include Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.; Pres. M. A. Hutcheson of the Carpenters, Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters and Pres. Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers. Labor Sec. George P. Shultz is chairman.

Two Union Staffers On Metric Panel

Two representatives of AFL-CIO unions have been named by Commerce Sec. Maurice H. Stans to serve on the 43-member Metric System Study Advisory Panel. They are Research Directors Vernon E. Jirikowic of the Machinists and James E. Noe of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The panel will review reports by the study group on the metric system now widely used in most countries.

No Apostles Need Apply For Administration Jobs

Atlantic City—AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany gave Atty. Gen. John M. Mitchell a lesson in the New Testament to the delight of the convention delegates.

Meany cited Mitchell's attempt to minimize the seriousness of the opposition to Judge Clement F. Haynsworth's nomination for Supreme Court justice with the contention that any nomination would be attacked, even if it were one of the 12 apostles.

This, Meany said is "rather an unfortunate analogy."

"If the 12 apostles were all brilliant lawyers, had been editors of the Harvard Law Review and clerks to Supreme Court justices and were recommended by the Bar Association, Mr. Mitchell still would not have regarded any of them as eligible for the post."

The apostles, Meany continued, were all poor, "preached the philosophy that a rich man could no more enter the kingdom of heaven than a camel could pass through the eye of a needle." They followed "a humble carpenter" and were dedicated to the cause of "the meek, the lowly and the underprivileged."

They were quite obviously unsuited for the post—"any post under this Administration"—Meany said, adding: "And with their ethnic background they would have had a tough time getting by Strom Thurmond."

Withdraw Haynsworth Nomination, Republican Senators Ask Nixon

in his efforts to learn more about the South Carolina judge's stock holdings.

"They tell us in Philadelphia that the records are in South Carolina, and they tell us in South Carolina that the records are in Philadelphia," Bayh said. "We've been getting the old dipsy-doodle."

Earlier, eight Negro congressmen joined in urging the Senate to deny confirmation to Haynsworth. Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.), spokesman for the group, termed Haynsworth's nomination "ominous" for the black community.

New evidence uncovered after the hearings closed added to the conflict of interest charges against Haynsworth.

The New York Daily News reported in a copyrighted story that Haynsworth played a part in six real estate deals involving the Carolina Vend-A-Matic Co. between 1958 and 1964. Haynsworth told the Senate committee on Sept. 16 that he took "no active part" in the vending company's affairs after he was appointed to the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals in 1957.

The Daily News story said the six real estate transactions involved four tracts of land and took place between March 1958 and April 1964. It was on April 8, 1964, that Carolina Vend-A-Matic was sold to Automatic Retailers of America, Inc., and Haynsworth sold his stock in the company for $450,000.

In regard to Haynsworth's previous contention that he "took no active part" in Vend-A-Matic affairs, the Daily News said, "The judge's participation in real estate deals through Carolina Vend-A-Matic, however, appeared to indicate that he paid attention to at least one facet of the company's business."

Haynsworth's holdings in the vending company provoked the first of a series of conflict-of-interest charges which have been brought against Haynsworth since he was nominated by Nixon on Aug. 18 as a replacement for Fortas.

Haynsworth failed to disqualify himself from a 1963 decision involving the Deering Milliken textile chain with which Vend-A-Matic was doing $100,000 business each year.

He cast the deciding vote in a 3-2 decision that Deering Milliken had the right to close a plant to avoid bargaining with the union selected by its employes. The Supreme Court reversed that decision.

It was subsequently revealed in Senate hearings that Haynsworth's wife had been secretary of the vending firm and he was a vice president and member of the board of directors in addition to holding the stock which he later sold for $450,000.

Later in the two-week hearings on the Haynsworth nomination, it was discovered that he bought stock in the Brunswick Corp. while litigation involving that company was before his court. Haynsworth's stockbroker, Arthur McCall, testified before the committee on that transaction.

McCall was named in another recent New York Daily News story as one of the partners in the purchase of a 190-acre tract near Greenville, S.C., which was sold for a cemetery.

The Daily News said other partners in that transaction were Haynsworth and Bobby Baker, the former secretary of the Senate majority who has been convicted on charges of mishandling political contributions.

At the windup of the Haynsworth hearings, the Judiciary Committee heard testimony from William Pollock, president of the Textile Workers, and Paul Jennings, president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

Pollock recounted the history of the conspiracy among southern textile companies to limit workers' rights and called Haynsworth "foremost among the judges of the 4th Circuit who have sought to limit workers' rights guaranteed by the National Labor Relations Act."

Pollock detailed Haynsworth's ties to Deering Milliken, J. P. Stevens, United Merchants & Manufacturers and other segments of the southern anti-union conspiracy and said that Haynsworth "so fully accepts its values that he does not even perceive a conflict of interest when he sits as a judge. . . ."

In stating that Haynsworth could never enjoy public confidence because of his conflicts of interest, Jennings said "The uniformity with which Judge Haynsworth has been reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States in labor and civil rights cases demonstrates the extent to which his thinking is out of line with accepted judicial decisions."

Virtually every trade union group which has held a convention since Haynsworth was nominated has issued a similar call to the Senate to deny the nomination.

The Council for Christian Social Action of the United Church of Christ told the Judiciary Committee of its opposition to Haynsworth's nomination, "because of his demonstrated indifference to conflicts of interest and because of the philosophy revealed by his decisions."

Despite the continuing protest over the Haynsworth nomination, Nixon said at a press conference that he has full confidence in Haynsworth.

Also, Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell, who has coordinated Haynsworth's defense, said he "saw not the slightest problem" in the various Senate revelations about Haynsworth.

Mitchell also said similar questions would have arisen if Nixon had nominated "one of the 12 Apostles." That prompted one political columnist to comment that of the 12 Apostles, only Matthew the tax collector had conflict-of-interest problems—and Matthew was told quite clearly that he could serve only one master.

Meany Keys Theme To Needs of Nation

By Saul Miller

Atlantic City—The AFL-CIO headed into the 1970s prepared to meet the challenges of a new decade with a program keyed to the needs of the country and a strong and expanding trade union movement.

The federation's eighth convention took a look at the 1960s and reviewed the great and tragic events. But its concern was with the Seventies and was perhaps best voiced by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany when he restated his keynote theme after his re-election to his eighth term: "We have come a long way but we still have a long way to go."

The AFL-CIO is heading into the Seventies with a new secretary-treasurer, Lane Kirkland, unanimously elected for his first full term, and an expanded Executive Council of 35 members. The convention added six new vice presidencies in a constitutional change and three members of the council stepped down, bringing a total of nine new vice presidents to the federation's top governing body between conventions.

To assure the federation of the resources to operate in the new decade, the delegates voted unanimously to increase the per capita tax from 7 to 10 cents per member per month, effective Nov. 1, 1969.

And to assure the integrity of the federation and its affiliates from dual, rival, raiding organizations the delegates voted by a 50 to 1 margin on a rollcall vote to expel the Chemical Workers, declaring that the union's affiliation with the Alliance for Labor Action did violence to AFL-CIO objectives and principles.

Elections Pose Early Test

One of the first challenges of the Seventies—the 1970 congressional elections—received major attention from the nearly 900 delegates who heard Meany pledge no retreat in the struggle for social gains and voted a series of resolutions carefully spelling out differences with the Administration on an issue-by-issue basis.

They voted support of the President on his efforts to end the Viet Nam war through negotiations for an honorable peace and heard Defense Sec. Melvin Laird spell out that policy. They heard also from Labor Sec. George P. Shultz on the Administration's economic policies and from Federal Mediation Dir. J. Curtis Counts on trends in labor-management disputes.

In the critical area of ending discrimination across the board, the delegates cheered Bayard Rustin as he assailed Administration moves to slow down integration in some areas while espousing policies to divide black and white workers and diverting them from the necessity of securing jobs, housing, education for every American.

The delegates and hundreds of guests came to their feet cheering for Israeli Prime Minister Golda Meir who spelled out Israel's case for survival in simple, trade union terms and recalled the close, historic ties of the AFL-CIO and Histadrut, the Israeli Federation of Labor.

The 1970 elections were put into perspective also by former Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey who spelled out a point-by-point indictment of the Administration as he called for a renewed drive for liberal, progressive programs.

And indicative of the physical challenge of the new decade was the greeting given Col. Edwin E. Aldrin, Jr., the first union man to

Republicans Join in Opposition:

Haynsworth Protest Mounts As Delegates Voice Outrage

By David L. Perlman

Atlantic City—American labor expressed its outrage at the nomination of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., to the Supreme Court in a scathing resolution adopted unanimously by the AFL-CIO convention.

And while the convention met, open Senate opposition to promoting Haynsworth to the Supreme Court grew from a trickle to a torrent as both Republicans and Democrats called on Pres. Nixon to withdraw the nomination.

Fueling the drive to block the nomination was a mass of new evidence of Haynsworth's inability to separate his financial wheeling-and-dealing from his courtroom responsibilities.

Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) made public a documented report showing that Haynsworth has repeatedly violated judicial conflict of interest codes and that his conduct "falls short of the demanding ethical standards" expected of a Supreme Court justice.

Two of the four top Republican leaders in the Senate have already said they will vote against confirming Haynsworth. And former Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey—speaking from the AFL-CIO convention—called on Senate Democrats to "stand up like men" and vote down the nomination if it isn't withdrawn, "which it ought to be."

The nation, Humphrey said, owes a debt of gratitude to the AFL-CIO and Federation Pres. George Meany for protecting the public interest by exposing the Haynsworth record.

Labor's indictment of Haynsworth in the convention resolution was a sober document that stressed the importance of the Supreme Court and of each of its nine members in the American system of government. (See Excerpts on Page 10.)

It acknowledged the right of a President to make appointments "from among those who have supported his cause and who reflect his own political coloration."

But the nomination of Haynsworth "goes far beyond those bounds," the convention said, because the nominee "is totally unqualified" to sit on the nation's highest court.

"On the record," it said, "Judge Haynsworth has demonstrated his hostility to trade unions and his hostility to civil rights—and either of these grounds should be cause enough for the Senate of the United States to reject his nomination."

Equally damning, it stressed, is "the appalling lack of ethical judgment displayed by Judge Haynsworth in failing to insulate his judicial affairs from his financial affairs."

Because of his "lack of candor,"

Jobless Rate Up to 4%, Highest Level in 2 Years

The nation's unemployment rate soared to its highest level in 23 months in September, bringing immediate repercussions over Pres. Nixon's anti-inflationary policies.

The unemployment rate of 4 percent for the month, announced by the Labor Dept., was a five-tenths of 1 percent jump, the largest monthly increase in nine years. It came at a time when joblessness usually declines.

Almost immediately after the Labor Dept. released its job figures, Assistant Treasury Sec. Murray L. Weidenbaum issued a statement hailing the higher unemployment as proof that the Administration's deflationary policies are beginning to work.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called both the Labor Dept. announcement and the Weidenbaum statement to the attention of the AFL-CIO convention in Atlantic City.

Meany, who had warned of the danger of recession in his opening address, noted that the developments ran contrary to a letter Nixon sent the convention suggesting that the Administration would cool the economy without increasing unemployment.

Former Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, also scored the Administration's anti-inflationary policies in singling out the new unemployment rate. "Beware of the signs of the times," Humphrey said.

At a news conference later on the day of the Labor Dept.'s announcement, Ronald Zeigler, the President's press secretary, commented that the jobless rate in-

Call for Special Effort Issued on '70 Elections

Atlantic City—The high political stakes in the 1970 congressional elections call for "an extraordinary effort" by the trade union movement in political action and education, the AFL-CIO's eighth convention declared.

The delegates adopted a resolution declaring that the elections pose "a strong challenge to the . . . capabilities of the labor movement," and called on all affiliates to give political action top priority next year.

In the past few months, the resolution said, it has become clear that "the new Administration is substantially more conservative than its predecessor. In addition, recent appointments to the Supreme Court and regulatory agencies are moving them towards a conservative and anti-labor direction."

It is "imperative," the resolution continued, that the present liberal strength in Congress be increased in the 1970 elections to assure a better chance for progressive proposals and prevent efforts to roll back social welfare progress or enact restrictive measures against unions.

Shultz Says Pay Boosts Don't Trigger Inflation

Atlantic City—Statistics over the past three years make it clear that wage increases are not to blame for the nation's inflationary spiral, Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz told the AFL-CIO convention.

Median increases for all industries, adjusted for price increases, he reported, were 2.4 percent in 1967, the same in 1968 and a "little under" 2 percent so far in 1969.

"That is not being responsible for inflation," Shultz declared.

In his adress and at a press conference, he defended the Administration's tight-money policies, contending they will bring inflation under control.

"I believe we can maintain high employment and good earnings," Shultz said, "without permitting inflation to gnaw away at the real worth, the buying power of these earnings."

Noting that the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. has criticized the Labor Dept.'s plan for getting more minority workers into the crafts by imposing "quotas," Shultz conceded that the word "connotes restrictions."

While he defended the plan as setting "realistic goals," he emphasized that the objective also could be reached by voluntary plans worked out by building trades unions and employers.

He complimented the building trades convention here for approving "affirmative action programs to bring more members of minority groups into the construction industry."

"I am aware that some of the building and construction trades have in fact made unusual efforts along these lines with notable success," Shultz added.

In other areas of his speech, Shultz outlined the issues of "the workplace, the bargaining table and the labor market" which are of the most concern to himself and the Labor Dept. He described some of them as follows:

- "We give a high priority to the need for safety legislation. . . . In human and economic terms, health and safety in the workplace is a problem of extraordinary dimensions. . . . America's health and safety record is backsliding."
- The Administration's attitude toward bargaining "is to encourage it. The freely-made bargain, collective or otherwise, is characteristic of a free society."
- In referring to the Administration's bill to "strengthen and modernize" the unemployment insurance system, Shultz alluded to the dependence upon states to expand benefits. But if they do not do it within two years, he added, "The federal government will have to take action itself."
- Development of human resources through manpower programs "is both a human and an economic responsibility. There are too many groups in our population in which "the rate of unemployment is unacceptably high."
- The Administration will be sending Congress legislation "in the near future" to assist workers and firms adversely affected by import competition.

Convention Lists 894 Delegates

Atlantic City—The decisions of the AFL-CIO's eighth constitutional convention were made by 894 delegates, the credentials committee said in its final report.

The delegates represented 117 national and international unions, 6 departments, 43 state federations, 172 central labor bodies and 17 directly affiliated local unions.

There were 282 representatives of the general and labor press, radio, and television registered to cover the convention who wrote and broadcast many thousands of words.

Trade union representatives and visitors from 82 countries made up the delegation of 268 foreigners at the convention. They were introduced to the delegates at various points through the four days.

Ratification Urged For Rights Pacts

Atlantic City—The Senate was called upon by the AFL-CIO convention to ratify the human rights conventions of the International Labor Organization.

The treaties deal with genocide, forced labor, women's political rights and freedom of association. The convention pointed out that many of the nations of the world have ratified the treaties, some as long as 21 years ago. The United States has ratified only the convention on slavery, and the others have been bottled up in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Members of the Foreign Relations Committee were urged to spur committee Chairman J. William Fulbright (D-Ark.) to action.

24 Vice Presidents Re-Elected:

Top Officers Get New Terms, 9 Newcomers Join Council

Atlantic City—The AFL-CIO's two top officers—Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland—were elected by acclamation to new two-year terms.

Meany has headed the federation since the merger of the AFL and the CIO in 1955; Kirkland was named secretary-treasurer last July after the retirement of William F. Schnitzler.

Also elected by acclamation were 33 vice presidents who serve on the AFL-CIO Executive Council. Earlier in the convention, the constitution was changed to increase the number of vice presidents from 27.

Twenty-four of the present council members were re-elected. Three announced their retirement: David Dubinsky of the Ladies' Garment Workers, Paul L. Phillips of the Papermakers & Paperworkers and P. L. Siemiller of the Machinists.

That left nine vacancies to be filled, and the convention elected the following new vice presidents, all currently presidents of their unions:

Peter Bommarito, Rubber Workers; Peter Fosco, Laborers; Thomas W. Gleason, Longshoremen; John F. Griner, Government Employes; Charles Luna, United Transportation Union; Frederick O'Neal, Actors' Equity; Floyd E. Smith, Machinists; Louis Stulberg, Ladies Garment Workers, and Jerry Wurf, State, County & Municipal Employes.

Rubber Union Leader

Bommarito, 54, is in his second two-year term as URW president. A member of Local 101 in Detroit for 30 years, Bommarito left the presidency of that local to serve as an international vice president for six years before becoming president.

Bommarito has served as member of the General Board of the AFL-CIO and is a vice president of the Industrial Union Dept. He resides in the Akron, Ohio, suburb of Mogadore.

Fosco served 18 years as general secretary-treasurer of the Laborers before becoming president last Nov. 11. His labor career started in Chicago, where he was president and business manager of Laborers Local 2 before becoming regional manager for the union in Chicago in 1936.

As chairman of the Organizing Committee for Heavy and Highway Construction in Chicago, Fosco headed the drive that led to unionization of the industry. He is currently on the Executive Council of AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and on its five-member administrative committee.

Gleason, 68, has been president of the ILA since 1963. He went to work on the docks and joined the ILA in New York at the age of 19, and by 1932 was blacklisted by the companies for his union activities.

Returned to Docks

After supporting his family with odd jobs, he returned to the docks and became a full-time ILA organizer in 1947. Four years later he became an executive vice president, a post he held for 12 years before becoming president.

Griner, 62, became president of AFGE in 1962 and has been reelected to three subsequent two-year terms. He was an AFGE vice president for the previous 16 years.

A native of Georgia, Griner joined the federal service in 1936 as adjudicator, Railroad Retirement Board, and later became labor relations officer. He attained his law degree in 1940.

Luna, 62, was president of the Railroad Trainmen from 1963 until UTU was born Jan. 1, 1969, of the merger of four operating railroad unions.

A native of Texas and a member of Lodge 671 since 1929, Luna became a vice president in 1954 and assistant to the president in 1960 before becoming president.

O'Neal, 64, is a native of Mississippi who organized the Aldridge Players Community Theatre in 1927 in St. Louis. In 1936, he moved to New York where he founded the American Negro Theatre in 1940.

Besides being president of Actors Equity, O'Neal is a member of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee and numerous theatrical and civil rights organizations.

Smith, 56, became IAM president July 1 after eight years as a general vice president. Smith became a machinist's helper in St. Louis in 1929 and served in a variety of local union offices.

Laid off during the Depression, Smith became a bricklayer and was president of the Bricklayers' local in Las Vegas when he was appointed deputy labor commissioner for Nevada. In 1945 he became an assistant IAM business representative and served as Grand Lodge representative to seven northwestern states and Alaska before becoming a general vice president in 1961.

Stulberg, 68, has been ILGWU president since 1966. He became secretary-treasurer in 1959 after three years as an executive vice president. After his first union position as a general organizer in Chicago in 1924, Stulberg was instrumental in organizing the garment industry on the eastern seaboard.

Born in Poland, Stulberg came to Canada as a youngster and first joined the ILGWU in Toronto as a teenager. He graduated from Harbord Collegiate Institute and later attended the University of Chicago.

Wurf, 50, has been president of SCME since 1964. As director of Council 37 in New York City, Wurf started with a few hundred members in what is now an 80,000-member unit. Similarly, SCME has more than doubled its membership since 1964.

A native of New York City, Wurf attended public schools there and graduated from New York University in 1940. He became an SCME organizer in 1947.

Capital Budget Proposed for U.S.

Atlantic City—The United States should adopt a budget system that is "almost universally used by modern business corporations, by most western democracies, by at least one-third of the states and by most of the larger American cities," the AFL-CIO urged.

The convention resolution said a separate "capital budget" is needed to identify expenditures looking to future benefits—such as job-creation programs and expanded public facilities to meet the needs of a growing population.

The ordinary budget should cover general government and national defense needs, the convention said, with capital expenditures listed separately.

The resolution urged the President to include a capital budget in his next submission of budget proposals to Congress.

Convention Charts Course For 1970s

Labor's Goals Keyed To Needs of Nation

walk on the moon, who thanked the nation's workers for their skills and tax dollars and brought the miracle of space exploration a bit closer to understanding.

The AFL-CIO program for the 1970s was spelled out in more than 100 resolutions adopted by the delegates out of a mass of 274 presented to the Resolutions and other committees. They covered every aspect of American life with a heavy emphasis on programs and policies, on the crisis in the cities, the danger of recession and growing unemployment, bringing the poor and minority groups into the mainstream of American life, the need to improve the quality of life and the environment in which it is lived.

There was a growing concern also with international trade policies, the trend toward economic concentration and mergers and the continuing, never-ending work of the trade union movement — organizing the unorganized and stepping up and expanding collective bargaining.

The breakthroughs and the difficulties in the latter areas were documented in a dramatic appearance before the convention of Mary Moultrie, president of the Charleston, S. C., hospital workers' local of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, who was jailed for defying an injunction limiting picketing. She recounted the battle to establish the union and how a united labor movement threw its full strength behind the hospital workers to secure victory.

The convention took note also of the creation of two new AFL-CIO organizations since the last sessions in 1967—the Human Resources Development Institute to coordinate the activities of unions in manpower training programs and pioneer new approaches, and the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center where special institutes in staff training and other educational activities will get under way in December.

There was also the immediacy of blocking the nomination of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., to the U.S. Supreme Court, the need to secure meaningful tax reform in the Senate, the Farm Workers' grape boycott campaign and efforts to prevent the Administration from ducking out on prosecution of auto manufacturers in an air pollution conspiracy case.

Meany reflected the mood of the convention when he told the delegates after his election that "I am supremely confident that this movement can do its job . . . irrespective of what Administration is in Washington, irrespective of who is in the White House."

He stressed "we will continue to be the people's lobby and we will continue to protect the interests of the great mass of American wage earners."

And Kirkland, speaking of the federation, said "we are the main enduring force in the struggle for human progress. We are blessed and strengthened by one piece of sure and certain knowledge, that there are no lost causes for us; that the fight is never over. . . ."

CONVENTION PODIUM parley brings together AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Vice Pres. I. W. Abel, center, and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland. Abel, president of the Steelworkers and the Industrial Union Dept., was Resolutions Committee chairman.

Stronger Central Bodies Seen Paying Dividends

Atlantic City—Stronger and more effective state and local central bodies would pay "substantial dividends" for labor's political and legislative programs, the AFL-CIO convention was told.

A report from the convention's Committee on State & Local Central Bodies stressed the importance of these "operating arms of the AFL-CIO" in translating labor's policies into action.

It noted gains in affiliations and membership by a number of state central bodies, but stressed that too many local unions still do not participate in their state's labor movement. Only Hawaii and South Dakota were close to their potential membership, the report observed.

The committee, headed by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Lee W. Minton, noted the efforts made by the office of the AFL-CIO Coordinator of State & Local Central Bodies to encourage affiliations and help improve effectiveness.

Under a policy instituted in 1965, AFL-CIO awards are given to national and international unions that have at least 80 percent of their locals affiliated with state central bodies.

Four more unions qualified for the award this year, bringing the total to 23. The new award winners are the Ladies' Garment Workers, the Window Glass Cutters, the Masters, Mates & Pilots and the Amalgamated Transit Union.

The convention committee suggested some areas for making central bodies even more effective:

- A program of training for central body officers, particularly needed in small and medium sized local labor councils.

It said the new AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center could become "the ideal medium" for such a training program.

- A handbook for officers of central bodies, which "should be very useful to both new and experienced officers."
- A policy of making fulltime jobs with the larger state and local central bodies "sufficiently attractive" to the best qualified people in the labor movement.

The committee urged also that all unions that have not done so designate a responsible official to work with the AFL-CIO coordinator in bringing their locals into complete affiliation.

Flood Insurance Extension Urged

Atlantic City—Concern for the plight of hurricane and flood victims was expressed by the convention as it called on Congress to amend the National Flood Insurance Act to make available immediate flood insurance coverage to all citizens at a reasonable rate.

The convention noted that thousands of families in the Southern and Eastern coastal areas lost their homes and belongings to the devastation of Hurricane Camille.

Most of these victims were not covered by insurance because private insurance firms are unwilling or unable to insure against flood losses except at prohibitive cost.

The convention also urged that the maximum amount that a single dwelling unit can be insured be raised to a more realistic level, and that a $10 billion ceiling be put on total flood insurance.

AFL-CIO Expels Chemical Union For Affiliation with Rival ALA

Atlantic City—By an overwhelming 50-to-1 margin on a rollcall vote the eighth convention expelled the Chemical Workers from the AFL-CIO, declaring that the union's affiliation with the Alliance for Labor Action does "violence to the objectives and principles of the federation."

The vote on expulsion came on a report from the Committee on Resolutions. It recommended approval of the supplemental report of the AFL-CIO Executive Council calling for revocation of the certificate of affiliation.

The vote was 12,482,388 to expel, 244,815 against expulsion and 235,024 not voting. The votes against expulsion came from the Chemical Workers, Technical Engineers, Typographical Union, two of the four Glass Workers' delegates and a minority of the Teachers Union delegation. Two central labor body delegates also voted against expulsion.

The resolutions committee's report to the convention said that ICWU Pres. Thomas E. Boyle appeared before the committee and confirmed that his organization had affiliated with the ALA—set up by the Teamsters and the Auto Workers. The former was expelled by the AFL-CIO in 1957 on charges of domination by corrupt elements and the latter disaffiliated earlier this year.

Boyle claimed, the committee noted, that "giving aid and comfort to the ALA and, in turn receiving aid and comfort from the ALA does not constitute sufficient ground to sever the relationship of the Chemical Workers with the AFL-CIO."

The committee stressed "we do not agree," declaring that the ALA is a "dual organization rival to the AFL-CIO and that with complete knowledge of the true nature of the ALA, the Chemical Workers freely and voluntarily embraced it and aligned itself with it."

The Executive Council's report to the convention traced the development of the ALA as "a dual organization, rival to the AFL-CIO." It cited statements of objectives clearly indicating "the aggressive and disruptive designs of the ALA" towards AFL-CIO unions. And it repeated the warning issued by the council nearly a year before the Chemical Workers chose to join the ALA that affiliation constitutes grounds for expulsion from the AFL-CIO.

Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel, chairman of the convention resolutions committee, moved the adoption of the committee resolution to expel the Chemical Workers—an action requiring a two-thirds vote.

ICWU Officers Oppose

The two top officers of the Chemical Workers—Boyle and Sec.-Treas. Marshall Shafer—took the floor to oppose the expulsion resolution.

"We have done nothing wrong," Boyle told the convention. "We are not corrupt; we are not Communists and we have paid our per capita tax." Therefore, he argued, there are no grounds for expulsion.

Also speaking against the expulsion were Pres. David Selden of the Teachers, Pres. John J. Pilch of the Typographical Union, Sec.-Treas. Art Carter of the Contra Costa, Calif., Central Labor Council and Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman of the Meat Cutters.

Selden criticized the Chemical Workers for affiliating with ALA but suggested that the convention action stop short of expulsion. Pilch reiterated the ITU's traditional position on unrestricted autonomy of affiliates and said the expulsion proposal "stretches" the interpretation of the AFL-CIO constitution. Carter said he could not see that the Chemical Workers have done anything warranting expulsion, and Gorman said that while he couldn't quarrel with the expulsion resolution, he thought the action might be a bit too hasty and perhaps conciliation efforts could be explored.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the convention that the expulsion action is not to "punish" the Chemical Workers but to resolve "an organizational impossibility."

The AFL-CIO constitution requires affiliates to respect the organizing jurisdiction of other affiliates. The ALA "right now" is raiding AFL-CIO unions, Meany noted.

"What constitution do you live up to in case of conflict?" Meany asked. "Do you live up to the constitution of the ALA or the constitution of the AFL-CIO?"

Meany told the convention that "the very idea" of expelling a union "is distasteful to me." There is no personal quarrel, he said, but it was the Chemical Workers, not the AFL-CIO, which took the action to compel a breach.

Paul Hall, president of the Seafarers and of the Maritime Trades Dept., told the delegates the "basic issue is quite simple: Do you or do you not support the trade union movement as represented by the AFL-CIO?"

The fact that the Chemical Workers are among the smaller unions has nothing to do with the issue of expulsion, Hall said. He noted that the AFL-CIO had not hesitated to expel a much larger union, the Teamsters, on the basis of principle.

Meany's Leadership Hailed by Delegates

The American labor movement stands at full height today and it is largely due to the leadership of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, delegates to the eighth convention declared.

"No man in labor's history has contributed more to the well-being of America's workers and to the nation as a whole," the convention resolution said.

"We believe the unity and growth and the economic, political and social impact of the AFL-CIO represents a high watermark," it said. "Behind this record of achievement lies the unflinching efforts of trade unionists everywhere. Behind their ceaseless efforts is the inspiring and tireless leadership of Pres. George Meany."

GPO Urged to Shun Non-Union Print Shops

Atlantic City—An effort to stop the Government Printing Office from subcontracting work to non-union print shops was voted by the AFL-CIO convention.

The resolution asked that pressure be brought on the GPO to channel as much work as possible into fair printing shops and called on the AFL-CIO to contact government representatives to that end.

FULL HOUSE describes this meeting of the convention resolutions committee with Chairman I. W. Abel presiding, center right. Committee members considered 274 resolutions, with more than 100 sent to the convention for final action.

Bargaining Can Bring Better Life, Labor Says in Spelling Out Goals

Atlantic City—The American labor movement affirmed its faith in the collective bargaining process as the basic mechanism for raising the living standards and improving the working conditions of the nation's workers.

An AFL-CIO convention resolution expressed in broad terms the goals that unions will seek at the bargaining table.

"We will continue to press for wage and salary increases to offset rising living costs and to advance buying power," the convention said.

America's workers, it declared, deserve to share in the nation's rising productivity "and to achieve a greater share in the distribution of income."

"We will continue to seek improvement in conditions of work," the delegates resolved. Improved job security, better health-welfare plans, pensions, training programs were among the points specified.

The drive for a reduction of working hours will also continue—along a variety of paths, including longer vacations and additional holidays as well as a shorter workweek.

And the convention expressed its support for "the voluntary efforts of affiliated unions to coordinate their bargaining with conglomerate firms and with firms in the same industry."

Two other resolutions touched on the problems of labor's relations with the nation's industrial giants.

One commended the solidarity of the AFL-CIO unions which are coordinating their bargaining efforts with General Electric and Westinghouse through a joint committee headed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

It pledged the labor movement's "wholehearted support" to the endeavor.

Paul Jennings, president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, told the convention that General Electric still is following a take-it-or-leave-it policy at the bargaining table—"telling the workers what they are entitled to get and then trying to shove it down their throats."

A resolution on business mergers said the sharp rise in consolidations of big corporations has posed special problems for unions as well as endangering the economy as a whole.

It cited plant shutdowns and "the shift of decision-making in collective bargaining from the plant to distant headquarters where financial matters are the primary concern."

And for the nation as a whole, the trend has concentrated enormous economic power in the hands of a few corporate giants and major banks.

Action Urged

The resolution urged action by Congress, the Justice Dept. and government regulatory agencies to curb the trend.

In the overall collective bargaining resolution, the convention expressed the basic reason why the negotiating table is so important to the nation.

During a period of "rapid and radical changes" in technology and in the nature of American business and industry, collective bargaining "has proved its vitality, ingenuity and flexibility."

It has replaced autocracy or paternalism with industrial democracy and created the high living standard which is the basis of the nation's economy, the resolution noted.

The convention pledged to work for the extension of collective bargaining rights to all workers and warned against attempts to undermine unions through so-called "right-to-work" laws and other repressive legislation.

It hailed the growing acceptance of collective bargaining and union organization among groups of workers previously outside of the labor movement.

And it stressed that, "with all of its human imperfections," the collective bargaining process has achieved "a high degree of industrial peace" for the nation.

Rubber Workers Pick 2 Department Heads

Akron — The Rubber Workers named Ron G. Fisher as new research director and Thomas E. Dotson as education director. Dotson will replace John D. House when he retires Dec. 31. Fisher succeeds Kenneth Thornbury, who resigned for a post at the University of Colorado.

To At Least $2-an-Hour:

Hike in Wage Floor Called 'Urgent' Need

Atlantic City—A minimum wage of at least $2 an hour is "urgently needed by America's low-wage workers and their families," the AFL-CIO said.

The federation served notice that its continuing drive for a $2 wage floor and expansion of coverage under the Fair Labor Standards Act may soon have to be updated.

If the rise in living costs continues unchecked, the federation said, the $2 figure will become "obsolete" and labor's goal will have to be raised to $2.50 an hour.

A separate resolution called on Congress to provide the funds needed to enable the Labor Dept. to hire more wage-hour investigators. There are now too few to uncover most of the violations of the law, the convention said.

The minimum wage resolution noted the exclusion of more than 13 million workers from the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act. It added:

"Many of these workers are among the poorest-paid and most exploited in our society. The law's coverage must be extended to these workers to guarantee them protection from poverty wages."

About one-third of the nation's poor, the AFL-CIO stressed, "are in families headed by a full-time, year-round worker whose wages are so low that his family is impoverished."

It declared that "the responsibility of providing a living wage to workers lies not with the taxpayers, but with employers who benefit from the work of their employes."

America's "working poor," the resolution said, "are not looking for handouts. Rather, they seek a wage which provides at least a minimum level of living."

The convention urged Congress to act on bills introduced by Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.) and Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) that would establish a $2 minimum and extend coverage to most workers now exempt.

It protested the suggestion of some Administration officials for a sub-minimum wage for youth. Such a system, the resolution noted, "would undercut the wages of adult workers and set a lower rate of pay for the same work—based not upon the job and work performed, but upon the age of the worker."

The AFL-CIO also urged that Congress move as rapidly as possible to narrow the present gap between minimum wage rates for Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands and American Samoa and the minimum wage on the mainland.

On wage-hour enforcement, the convention noted that the Labor Dept. reported that nearly a half-million workers were underpaid by their employers last year—but only about one-third of the underpayments have been recovered.

Not only are there too few investigators, the resolution added, but "there are some in government who would give these wage-hour investigators an additional mixture of responsibilities, further diluting their ability to enforce the Fair Labor Standards Act."

The convention commended AFL-CIO state and local central bodies for their response to Federation Pres. George Meany's request that they set up wage-hour enforcement committees to assist workers in reporting violations of the wage law.

The resolution asked that this assistance to low-wage workers be continued.

Urging the importance of an adequate federal inspection staff, the resolution noted that with the present force only 3 percent of the nation's covered establishments can be inspected each year.

Bakery Unions' Merger Approved by Council

Atlantic City—The newly elected 35-member AFL-CIO Executive Council at its first meeting hours after the close of the eighth convention gave its unanimous approval to a merger of two bakery workers unions.

The council instructed the executive officers to issue a new charter to the merged union at its convention scheduled for Dec. 12 in Atlantic City. The American Bakery & Confectionery Workers and the Bakery & Confectionery Workers will join into one union carrying the latter name with a membership of about 150,000.

The merger had been approved by the executive board of both unions and the B&C voted approval of the merger agreement at a convention held last week. The B&C union was expelled from the AFL-CIO in 1957 on charges of being dominated by corrupt elements. The federation a few days later formed the ABC, which since 1957 has become the larger union with a membership of about 87,000. The B&C has a membership of about 62,000.

The council also approved a change in the name of the Painters union adopted at its recent convention to the Painters & Allied Trades, noting that the name change did not affect the union's basic jurisdiction.

In other actions the new council voted $10,000 to the Oil Workers' strike fund to assist with various strikes the union is engaged in and appropriated a like sum to the Jewish Labor Committee.

It contributed $2,500 to a special fund set up by the Kenya Federation of Labor to aid the family of the late Tom Mboya.

U.S. Role Urged In Education Year

Atlantic City—Full participation of the United States in the 1970 International Education Year was urged by the AFL-CIO convention. The IEY was initiated by the U.S. government with the United Nations General Assembly and its educational, scientific and cultural arm, UNESCO.

The goals of the IEY program include a worldwide effort to improve the status and scope of education through an assessment of educational needs, better training of teachers, democratization of the systems and the furtherance of international understanding and peace.

The federation pledged its cooperation with the Teachers Union in endorsing the IEY program and called on the President and the U.S. Office of Education to plan and prepare fully for the IEY activities.

Overhaul of Labor Law Keyed to Original Goals

Atlantic City—A major overhaul of the National Labor Relations Act was urged by the AFL-CIO convention.

The changes are needed, the convention said, to accomplish the original intent of the basic labor law—"to safeguard the right of the working men and women of America to organize unions of their own choosing."

Specific proposals in the resolution include these:

- Repeal of Section 14(b) which permits states to outlaw union shop agreements. These "right-to-work" laws, it noted, are the hallmark of "the poorest and least organized states" and contribute to a "hostile environment" of violence to union organizers and discharge of union supporters.
- A speed-up of National Labor Relations Board procedures to lessen long delays in both unfair labor practice cases and representation proceedings. One step should be restriction of the NLRB's right to conduct pre-hearing elections, the AFL-CIO said.
- More effective remedies under the labor law. At present, employers can violate the law "deliberately and flagrantly" with the knowledge that sanctions ultimately invoked will be "feeble as well as belated."

One important way of dealing with chronic violators, the resolution stressed, would be to disqualify them from doing business with the federal government.

Employers should be required to reinstate workers as soon as the NLRB general counsel finds there is reasonable cause to believe they were fired for union activity.

- Elimination of "unfair restrictions imposed on legitimate union activity by the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin Acts."
- A change in the law "so that third parties who do an employer's dirty work for him can be held responsible for their anti-union conduct."
- Extension of protection under the labor law to groups of workers now excluded, including agricultural workers, employes of non-profit hospitals and others "who most need union organization and collective bargaining."

And, the convention said, the National Labor Relations Act "is only as meaningful as the U.S. Supreme Court will allow it to be."

In the past, the court has generally acted "to make the law work" and has consistently reversed anti-labor decisions of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., and other employer-oriented judges.

Haynsworth's nomination to the Supreme Court, the resolution suggested, will "embolden" employers who have shown contempt for the labor law.

Deaths, Injuries Mount:

Job Safety Termed 'National' Concern

Atlantic City—Congress must enact federal occupational health and safety legislation "as a matter of national responsibility," the AFL-CIO convention asserted.

For many years, a resolution emphasized, labor has been urging such legislation "to eliminate or control the hazards of the work place and reduce the mounting toll of on-the-job deaths and injuries."

Now, it continued, available information indicates that 1969 "was still another year of increases in occupational deaths and injuries," with 14,300 deaths and 2.2 million injuries.

"If there were adequate national reporting of occupational deaths, illnesses and injuries," the resolution added, "the present picture, shocking though it is, probably would be twice as bad as it now appears.

"No one clearly knows the implications to human health as industrial technology adds to the list of known toxic chemicals and materials, threatening workers each day on the job."

The resolution urged Congress to adopt legislation to:

- Empower the Secretary of Labor to promulgate, develop and enforce health and safety standards, using existing standards where adequate and developing new ones where needed.
- Provide for strong federal inspection, enforcement and penalty provisions, with hearing procedures and court review for persons who feel aggrieved by their application.
- Grant a stronger role for the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare in developing criteria for standards and standards themselves, aided by creation of an occupational health center.
- Make sure that standards cover all workers—farm, non-farm and state and federal employes.
- Set up federal guidelines for proposed state occupational safety and health plans as a condition for federal planning and operational grants-in-aid.
- Create permanent coordinating machinery to permit the Secretaries of Labor and Health, Education & Welfare "to work closely together and fully utilize their joint resources" in carrying out their health and safety responsibilities.
- Establish a National Advisory Committee on Occupational Safety & Health, with membership including representation from labor.

The convention noted that Pres. Johnson proposed strong federal safety legislation last year but business groups—"through the use of vicious and misleading propaganda"—succeeded in killing it.

This year, the resolution said, "even stronger bills" have been introduced and the Nixon Administration also has submitted a health and safety proposal.

It urged enactment of legislation sponsored by Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) and Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) as "constituting a sound program requiring a minimum of strengthening amendments."

"Such a program, adequately funded and staffed, will constitute a first decisive step toward the ultimate achievement of a safe and healthy place of employment" for every worker, the resolution emphasized.

Sec.-Treas. Arthur P. Gildea of the Brewery Workers, who is a vice president for labor on the National Safety Council, and Sec.-Treas. Sol Stetin of the Textile Workers Union of America spoke for the resolution.

Gildea urged every affiliate "to roll up its sleeves and get to work for federal legislation this year." Stetin described "crippling and deadly". lung diseases caused by contaminated air in textile plants.

THANKS TO LABOR for bearing the brunt of the political battle in 1968 were expressed by former Vice Pres. Hubert Humphrey at the Atlantic City convention. Without labor voters and COPE, "this country would be in a sorry plight," Humphrey said.

Humphrey Calls Labor Conscience of America

Atlantic City—Hubert Humphrey called on organized labor to continue in its role as the conscience of America in a speech before the AFL-CIO convention in which he also thanked the labor movement "for carrying the brunt of the political battle in 1968."

"If everyone had done as well as you did, I would have had this meeting in the East Room of the White House," Humphrey said.

In issuing the call to the delegates to "stand up for what you have stood up for all your life," Humphrey recited America's needs in employment, education, health, tax reform, race relations and quality of environment.

"Our goal must be an America free of hunger," the former Vice President said. "Our goal must be an America that cares for its sick, for its disabled and for its elderly.

"The labor movement has jarred America out of lethargy before," he said. "I ask you to join as never before, because we know how to fight better now than ever before."

Humphrey bore down especially hard on increasing interest rates and said this "rent on money" is costing the average young family a bedroom today. Interest rates are forcing them to buy a house one bedroom smaller than they normally could have afforded, Humphrey explained.

He acknowledged he has been quiet in his criticism of the Administration up to now, but said it is time to speak out against a tight-money policy which has interest rates at their highest since the Civil War and has allowed unemployment to leap from 3.5 percent in August to 4 percent in September.

Sets Priorities

He also said he was against high priorities for getting to Mars or building the supersonic transport and the antiballistic missile system.

"Rather than guarantee a landing on Mars in the 1980s," Humphrey said, he would rather hear "that we are going to guarantee that every American shall have a chance for good education in 1976."

On the SST, he said it would be more realistic to be concerned about how to get your baggage at a modern airport. Airport development is 10 years behind now, he declared, and air safety is a matter of great concern even with today's jets.

When workers have to spend an hour and a half in bumper-to-bumper traffic to get to work, "I submit that rather than trying to get above this smog with the supersonic transport for a handful of people who will travel between New York and London, it might be better to try to find a way to get from the house to the job without suffocating.

"The missiles that threaten this nation today are not just those of the Soviet Union or China, for which we have powerful deterrents. You know what the missiles are. They are exploding in our cities. They are exploding in the ghettos and the slums. They are exploding in black rage.

"They are exploding in heartbreak and it is the missile of hate and bigotry and alienation and poverty and ignorance and not being wanted and no place for the individual—those are the missiles that threaten America."

Humphrey said everyone in America owes a debt of gratitude to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany for calling attention to the record of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., when he was nominated to the Supreme Court.

He said Haynsworth's nomination either should be withdrawn or rejected by the Senate, and "I call upon Democrats to stand up like men and do something about it."

States Urged To Emphasize Income Tax

Atlantic City—States and cities were urged to turn to "truly progressive income taxes" to meet their growing financial need.

The key to fair taxation—at the state and local level as well as for the federal government—is that it be based on ability to pay, the AFL-CIO declared.

The convention said the federal government, with its "superior revenue-raising abilities," has an obligation to help states and cities finance specific programs—including education, job training, health services, public transportation, pollution control, urban renewal and welfare costs.

But, the resolution stressed, the federal government must establish standards to make sure the grants are used for the purpose they are intended.

The convention opposed "block grants" of federal money passed out to the states on a "no strings" basis.

It urged that federal tax laws provide an incentive for states to raise a larger part of their revenue from progressive income taxes and suggested one means might be a federal income tax credit for state and local income tax payments.

Meanwhile, the Federation said, "efforts must be made to blunt the inequities of sales and property taxes," such as exclusion of food and medicine, and rebates for low and moderate income groups.

Women's Job Rights Backed, Tax Aid Asked

Atlantic City—The AFL-CIO reiterated its support of women's employment rights in calling for full enforcement of equal pay for equal work, elimination of job discrimination and provision of education, training and expanded day care facilities for working mothers.

The convention also supported liberalized tax deduction for child-care expenses and improved maternity leave and benefit plans.

Calling the nation's 31 million working women "an important part of the nation's labor force," the convention urged the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to seek reconciliation of conflicts between Title VII of the Civil Rights Act and women's state labor laws.

But such actions, whether by the EEOC, the courts or legislatures, should be taken without abandoning necessary safeguards, the convention said.

The resolution termed "too sweeping" a recent EEOC opinion that state laws that prohibit or limit the employment of women are in conflict with Title VII.

The convention said the EEOC position fails to recognize such reasonable limits as occupational prohibitions and restrictions on maximum hours, night work and weight-lifting.

"Until adequate protection for all workers can be secured through general legislation," the convention said, "reasonable legal safeguards should be available for those who are most in need of them."

Trade unions also were called upon to expand efforts to organize women, some 4 million of whom are now union members.

Day care facilities should be expanded through states taking advantage of funds available under the Social Security Act, and the federal labor law should be amended to permit employer contributions to trust funds for day care centers, the convention said.

Need for Rail Safety Law Cited As Accidents Soar

Atlantic City—The AFL-CIO convention asked Congress to enact legislation to provide new safety standards on railroads because such action is the only language the railroads understand.

"A review of railroad history," a resolution said, "points to the salient fact that railroads only adopted practical safety measures when required to do so by enforcement of federal and state laws."

The need for a proposal before Congress to require more adequate inspection of maintenance and facilities is proved by an "alarming increase in accidents on railroads" over the past three years, the resolution stated.

The legislation also is needed, it pointed out, to protect the public and railroad workers from the increasing transportation of "dangerous chemical and petroleum products." Railroad unions contend that accidents involving such products are similarly increasing.

Another resolution gave the AFL-CIO's full support to legislation backed by railroad operating unions to change a 62-year-old law that allows railroads to work engine and train crews for 16 hours in a 24-hour period.

The legislation, now in Congress, would reduce the 16 hours to 12 as was recommended by a presidential railroad commission as far back as 1962.

In a third action, the convention supported the United Transportation Union's current collective bargaining efforts to maintain "safe train and yard crews" in road and yard freight service.

The resolution pointed out that railroad managements have "conducted a propaganda campaign" against their employes in an attempt to conceal "the job intensification" caused by longer, heavier and faster trains.

But more than 100 managements have "tacitly admitted" the need for safe crews, it noted, by signing consist agreements calling for one conductor and two brakemen in road service, and one conductor and two switchmen in yard service.

Two resolutions dealing with legislation on compulsory retirement for railroad workers were given extensive hearings by the Resolutions Committee and referred to the Executive Council because of the complexities involved.

Shoemaker, Sheinkman To Advise on Pensions

The Secretary of Labor reappointed Assistant Dir. Richard E. Shoemaker of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security for a two-year term on the department's Advisory Council on Employe Welfare and Pension Benefit Plans. A new appointee is Jacob Sheinkman, Clothing Workers vice president and general counsel.

AFL-CIO Asks Extradition of Air Hijackers

Atlantic City—An international agreement was urged by the AFL-CIO calling for mandatory extradition of commercial airliner hijackers.

The resolution asked the Administration to immediately work out bi-lateral agreements with all nations that would provide for hijackers to be tried and punished after extradition.

Hijacking of any commercial airliner greatly endangers the lives of the passengers and crew and results in delays and inconveniences for the victims and the airlines, the convention noted.

The hijacking of commercial aircraft will cease only when an international agreement is reached that recognizes "hijacking as a vicious international crime" and provides for punishment of the offense, the federation said.

A Tokyo convention on hijacking and other on-board aircraft offenses establishes sound international law to promote safety in civil aviation, the resolution stressed, but it does not provide any punishment for the hijacking offenses.

UN Called On To Work Out Ocean Rights

Atlantic City—The U.S. government was called upon by the AFL-CIO to seek United Nations help in clarifying questions of jurisdiction over the seas brought about by technological advances in fishing, oil exploration and the use of atomic energy.

Old doctrines of 3- to 12-mile limits are no longer adequate when giant fishing factories are capable of over-fishing in productive areas and oil explorers have the equipment to deplete rapidly any and all oil reserves within the continental shelf, the AFL-CIO convention said.

The resolution said new questions that need to be answered by international agreement include who has jurisdiction over:

- Lands covered by seawater, during either high or low tides or both, which are contiguous to national coastlines.
- Lands under seawater which are beyond tidal areas but immediately adjacent to them.
- Underwater lands beyond claimed national territorial limits and the edge of the continental shelf.
- The high seas beyond the continental shelf and, most difficult of all, the bottom of the oceans under the high seas.

Some of these questions have always been bothersome, the resolution observed, but others were never a factor before the rapid development of oceanography. No one worried about ocean depths before it was possible to explore them, it was noted, but to continue today under the "first-come, first-served" rule of Columbus's time could lead to dangerous international confrontations.

FRIENDLY WELCOME of AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries goes to COPE Dir. Al Barkan at the convention of the women's organization in Atlantic City. Mrs. Marcella Beatty, Auxiliaries executive director, introduced Barkan.

Auxiliaries Approve Constitution Changes

Atlantic City—An increase in the per capita dues, elimination of the office of president and first vice president and actions to bolster "woman-power" highlighted a four-day convention of the AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries.

Delegates voted to increase the per capita tax of directly chartered and affiliated auxiliaries from 46 cents to $1 a year, and raise the per capita tax of union auxiliaries from 1 to 3 cents a month.

The resolution pointed out that the additional funds are needed to meet the pressures of rising costs and to expand the auxiliaries programs.

In addition to eliminating the president and first vice president's post, the auxiliaries amended rules for voting at conventions and determining the selection of convention delegates.

Mrs. Marcella Beatty, executive director, installed the following officers for two-year terms: Mrs. Novella Porter, secretary-treasurer; Mrs. Maggie Reimann, Mrs. Viola Moss, Mrs. Cora Jenkins, Mrs. Rosine McLemore, Mrs. Lela Cornett, Mrs. Vi Hornickel, and Mrs. Beverly Sathoff, all vice presidents.

The convention also established a new advisory council to be composed of one member from each union auxiliary. Its members are to be selected at a later date.

In a report to the convention, Mrs. Beatty described many of the auxiliaries' financial difficulties in recent years and supported the changes which were later made as essential to helping the organization make progress.

During the convention, delegates discussed and adopted proposals calling upon the auxiliaries to expand their organizing and union label activities, while continuing other programs—political action, education, community services, civil rights, safety and consumer education.

Convention speakers included Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Services Dept.; COPE Dir. Al Barkan; William Waslick, of the New Jersey State Safety Council; Mrs. Elizabeth Hanford, executive director of the President's Committee on Consumer Interests; Elaine B. Gutman of the Social Security Administration; and Susan Ellis of the AFL-CIO Public Relations Dept.

Counts Cites Acceptance Of Disputes Mediation

Atlantic City—There is a growing acceptance of mediation in labor-management disputes, J. Curtis Counts told delegates to the AFL-CIO convention.

Mediation is no longer regarded as a sign of weakness or of government interference or federal domination, the director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service said.

The assistance of a mediator is advantageous to the parties involved in terms of wages, profits and community prosperity, he observed, especially if it leads to a settlement without a work stoppage or if it shortens a stoppage.

"Fortunately, most contract negotiations are settled without a stoppage," Counts pointed out. And this is a tribute to the collective bargaining process and the people of the labor movement "who are the key to making it work," he stressed.

Counts said that mediation service statistics show that nine of ten cases in which mediators take part are settled without strikes. And these cases are generally the toughest, he added.

In 1968, the Federal Mediation Service participated in 18,000 cases and its mediators were directly involved in talks around bargaining tables in better than 8,000 of the cases, Counts reported.

He said federal mediators currently are helping settle labor-management disputes on an average of 365 a week.

"I certainly think this is a record that you can be proud of," he told the delegates.

Counts also noted that the mediation service has taken some bold steps to increase its value and effectiveness.

He said that federal mediators worked behind the scenes in the hospital disputes at Charleston, S.C.; even though the service is not chartered to get involved in that type of activity. And these efforts did help bring about a settlement.

The service also entered the dispute between the professional baseball players and club owners and helped bring the two groups together for talks and an eventual settlement, he reported. And it is continuing its efforts in the California table grape dispute as the farm workers strive to win union recognition and improved working conditions.

Delegates Approve Per Capita Boost

Atlantic City—The AFL-CIO convention overwhelmingly approved a constitutional amendment increasing the per capita tax paid by affiliates from 7 to 10 cents per month, effective Nov. 1, 1969.

The Executive Council's recommendation, which changes Article XV, Section 2 of the constitution, was adopted on a show-of-hands vote by well over the required two-thirds majority.

The proposal came to the convention with the unanimous recommendation of the August 1969 meeting of the council based on a study by a council subcommittee projecting federation expenses for the coming year. The study gave special attention to the needs of COPE's voter registration drive and the new AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center.

Special Effort Stressed For Election Test

The convention called on all AFL-CIO affiliates to:

- Press their regional and local officials to make political action "a preeminent part of their 1970 program."
- Assign as many staff members as possible to political action and education efforts at the earliest possible date.
- Cooperate fully in COPE registration and get-out-the-vote drives and to meet and, if possible, exceed the COPE voluntary dollar quotas in 1970.
- Assure top-to-bottom cooperation with COPE in every possible way "to assure the most effective labor political programs ever in 1970."

Nation Losing Battle:

Strong Action Key To Fight Pollution

Atlantic City—The United States is continuing to lose the battle against air and water pollution and the turning point is not in sight, the AFL-CIO said.

In a convention resolution calling for the creation of an overall environmental policy to cope with pollution, the AFL-CIO endorsed legislation to create a committee of advisers to find ways of "achieving a safe and sane balance between resource utilization and misuse."

The President's recently-created cabinet-level Environmental Quality Council was called an inadequate substitute for a statutory program under a specific government agency directed to carry out congressional policies.

The resolution said that more than 2,600 communities still discharge raw sewage into the nation's waters, leaving hundreds of towns below U.S. public health standards.

The automobile was termed the greatest single contributor to air pollution, producing 86 million tons of pollutants, 60 percent of the nation's total. While pollution controls are required on new cars, the number of cars is increasing too fast for pollution to be curtailed, the convention said.

The government was urged to purchase only automobile models with low emission of pollutants.

For control of water pollution, the convention also called for:

- Restoration of the full $1 billion budget for federal grants-in-aid sewage treatment plants during fiscal 1970 instead of the $214 million requested by the Administration.
- Amendment to the clean water restoration act to increase the federal commitment to communities beginning in 1971.
- Empowering the Secretary of the Interior to impose stronger rules over the location and type of municipal sewage treatment plants, and to intervene on serious pollution situations without waiting for the states to make the first move.
- Enactment of the Oil Pollution Act.
- Federal action in the 30 states which have failed to adopt water quality standards.
- No more effluent taxes on industrial wastes since such taxes constitute a license to pollute.

And on air pollution, the convention urged:

- Adoption by the Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare of national emission standards on all forms of air pollutants.
- A requirement by HEW's National Air Pollution Control Administration that each state provide adequate public notice, in understandable terms, before conducting hearings on air quality.
- Reduction in the time allowed for compliance with the Clean Air Act of 1967.
- Expansion by HEW of its research on pollution-free alternatives to internal combustion vehicles.

Metric Panel Urged to Study Worker Impact

Atlantic City—Protection of American workers in the event the United States switches over to the metric system of weights and measures was urged by the convention.

The worker's investment in tools, knowledge required for employment and necessary retraining should all be taken into consideration by the Metric Study Commission, a resolution said.

The commission to study the possible use of the metric system was authorized a year ago and instructed to report its findings to Congress within three years.

The convention noted that over 90 percent of the world's people now live in countries using the metric system. With the English midway through a 10-year conversion project, the United States and Canada could be the only two major countries to use the "English" system, the AFL-CIO noted.

Court Asked to Reject Auto Antitrust Decree

Atlantic City—The first resolution acted on by the AFL-CIO convention denounced a deal between the Administration and the giant auto manufacturers to suppress evidence in a major antitrust case.

The Justice Dept., under the Johnson Administration, had charged General Motors, Ford, Chrysler and American Motors of conspiring over a period of years to suppress the development and installation of pollution control devices on cars and trucks.

"But this year," the convention resolution charged, "the Nixon Administration, after secret negotiations, agreed to a consent decree—an out-of-court settlement in which the manufacturers would escape punishment for all past and present actions, but would promise not to conspire in the future."

If the consent agreement is accepted by the Federal District Court in Los Angeles, the resolution noted, all of the evidence uncovered by a federal grand jury "would be sealed forever" and communities and individuals would be effectively barred from bringing antitrust damage suits.

"It is an anomaly that this Administration urges stern measures against individual lawbreakers and allows corporate crime to go unpunished," the convention said.

The reason for the early action—on the first day of the convention—was to meet a deadline for submission of views to the federal judge who will decide whether to accept the out-of-court settlement.

Minutes after the resolution was unanimously approved, a telegram was on its way to the judge expressing the views of the American labor movement that the agreement should be rejected and the case brought to trial.

Government Held Entitled to Patents

Atlantic City—When the federal government pays billions of dollars to private corporations to finance research, the government and not the private firms should own the patents resulting from this research, the convention said.

It also endorsed legislation to bar private firms from requiring employes to waive their rights to inventions, even when the inventions do not result from their work.

Jobs for All Called Top Priority Goal

Convention Sees Recession Risk In Slowdown Economic Policies

Atlantic City—Make full employment "the top priority objective of national economic policy," the AFL-CIO convention urged Congress and the Administration.

Full employment means "jobs at decent wages for all people who are able to work," the federation said.

It means "a large-scale public service employment program" so that job-seekers who can't be absorbed in private industry will have useful jobs in government and community non-profit agencies.

"The employment gains of the 1960's must be extended," the federation said, "and not reversed by stifling the economy."

The convention sharply criticized the "blunderbuss" economic and monetary policies the Administration has used in an effort to cool inflation and slow down the economy.

Inflation hasn't been halted, the resolution noted, but unemployment has gone up, interest rates have soared, families have been priced out of the housing market and there is "a growing danger of recession."

To underscore the point, as the convention was acting on the resolution word was received of the sharp rise in the jobless rate for September.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany broke the news to the convention "that unemployment shot up to its highest level in 23 months . . . hitting hardest the young blue collar worker" and that the rise from 3.5 to 4 percent was "the biggest jump in nine years."

Meany then reminded the delegates of the letter from Pres. Nixon that was read to the convention promising that Administration anti-inflation policies are being undertaken "with a keen eye on jobs and on the whole employment picture."

Then Meany read to the delegates a news release quoting an Administration official—Assistant Treasury Sec. Murray L. Weidenbaum—as saying that the unemployment increase was evidence that the Administration's anti-inflation policy was taking hold.

"I think that speaks for itself," Meany told the delegates.

The convention's national economy resolution stressed that reduction of price pressures "can and must be achieved without a growing army of unemployed."

It calls for selective measures to get at the roots of "the profit inflation and capital goods boom."

And the convention reiterated labor's willingness to accept overall economic controls if the President determines that they are necessary.

But it stressed that any controls must apply equitably to "all prices, profits, dividends, rents and executive compensation, as well as employes' wages and salaries."

It noted that during the 1960s "after-tax corporate profits rose about 170 percent faster than the weekly take-home pay of the average worker."

Corporations and big banks, the resolution said, "have received a disproportionately large share of the economic gains of the 1960s and have been beneficiaries of the rising price level."

A "better balance" between wages and profits is needed to permit economic expansion "without booms and bust," the convention declared. It said "the profit inflation of the 1960s must be halted."

The convention expressed the labor movement's confidence that America has both "the productive ability and human ingenuity" to make the coming decade an era of steady progress.

In a related resolution, it stressed that a full employment, economic growth policy requires an adequate supply of money and credit "at reasonable interest rates."

It called on Congress to require the Federal Reserve System "to roll back current interest rates," which are now at their highest levels since the Civil War.

To prevent housing from taking the full brunt of restrictive monetary policies, the convention urged the government to support the mortgage market directly during periods of tight money.

And it proposed that the governing and advisory boards of the Federal Reserve system should include representatives of consumers, labor and small business.

In another area of economic and monetary policy, the convention warned against using the nation's balance of payments deficit as an excuse for undermining collective bargaining and holding down wages.

Part of the difficulty, the convention said, has been caused by failure of the Administration to restrict the outflow of American capital. The resolution also urged better international monetary flexibility to meet the world's expanding credit needs and relieve the strain on the dollar.

The convention opposed taxes on tourism and travel controls, and suggested that use of American-flag shipping would help plug the dollar drain.

In other proposals to strengthen the U.S. economy, the convention asked:

- Government action to curtail the wave of business mergers and the concentration of economic power and ability to control prices in the hands of a few giant corporations.
- An increase in the buying power of wages and salaries to assure workers "a fair share of economic progress and to strengthen mass consumer markets."
- Government programs to help returning veterans and displaced defense workers when the war in Viet Nam ends.

And overall, the federation urged, there must be "the will and national sense of purpose to meet the needs of a growing and increasingly urban population and to strengthen the fabric of our society."

EXPRESSIVE TALK to AFL-CIO convention was delivered by Mrs. Golda Meir, former Milwaukee school teacher who is now prime minister of Israel. Peace in the Middle East will come only if Arabs are willing to meet Israelis face to face in negotiations, she said.

Mrs. Meir Hails Labor, 'Where I Feel at Home'

Atlantic City—A former Milwaukee teacher who rose to the highest post of leadership in her adopted nation looked at her audience and said, "This is where I feel most at home."

Shielding her eyes from television and camera lights, Israeli Prime Minister Golda Meir added, "I have been looking for the Carpenters' sign. That is the union my father belonged to."

As she began speaking, she recalled coming to the United States from Russia as a child, her years here, her departure for Israel in her twenties and her work in Histadrut, Israel's labor movement.

"I am happy to be one of the million members in Histadrut out of a population of a little more than two and a half million." Mrs. Meir said.

Then, quietly but firmly, she told the delegates about her nation's desire for peace in the Middle East—a permanent peace that will only come through face-to-face negotiations between Israel and her Arab neighbors, she said.

No 'Big Powers' Needed

In reference to attempts by large nations to work out a peace formula, she declared "we do not believe that two big powers or four big powers have the moral right to sit down and decide the fate of other people. . . ."

"We believe that just as the Arabs met us face to face on the battlefield for over 20 years, they must be prepared to meet us face to face around the negotiating table," she said.

"As long as they are not prepared to face us in the negotiations for peace, then it means they are not prepared for peace."

Mrs. Meir expressed confidence that the United States, as participant in current talks, has "good and honest intentions" and would "never consent to an agreement which is not fair to both sides."

The problem, she said, is that the Soviet Union also is involved in the negotiations.

The Soviet Union, she continued, "is in the position of lawyer for the Arab countries, and Arab countries are its clients." The Soviet Union, she charged, incited the June 1967 war against Israel and equipped the Arabs to fight it.

"The Soviet Union is the enemy of Israel," she declared.

Stressing that "a peace with no gimmicks" can only be accomplished when the Arabs and Israel sit down to negotiations, she said the talks must also begin with a recognition by the Arabs of Israel's right to existence.

For it is a "tragic" fact, Mrs. Meir added, "that our Arab neighbors not only deny us our sovereignty, they deny us our physical existence."

"And as I have said before, there cannot be a compromise between life and death. You cannot be a little bit alive and a little bit dead to accommodate your neighbors. This is the struggle and nothing else."

Mrs. Meir, in a moving expression of her longing for peace, said that young boys in Israel were raised to "bring human dignity" to their own lives and build the nation, not to shoot and kill and be killed.

"And I do not believe that Egyptian and Syrian and Iraqian and Jordanian mothers are giving birth to their children . . . to go off to war and fight and die."

"Once the masses of Arab people stand up to their leaders and say 'There is no glory in having our sons killed,' I see a future for friendship, peace and cooperation between our neighbors and ourselves," she concluded.

When she finished speaking, Mrs. Meir presented AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany the Medallion of Jerusalem. The name of the city, which means "peace," she said, is an expression of it and Israel's "very dearest friendship."

In accepting the medal, Meany assured the prime minister of labor's continued strong support for Israel in its quest for peace and freedom.

"I am sure we agree that the only peace that is going to come in the Middle East is a peace that emanates from a bargaining table, with the Arabs on one side, and the Israelis on the other," Meany said.

Natural Resources Policy Urged To Preserve Quality of Environment

Atlantic City—America needs a comprehensive natural resources policy, integrated with a full-employment economic policy and a goal of preserving the quality of the physical environment, the AFL-CIO declared.

The convention approved resolutions on natural resources which made these points:

- Water development: Multi-purpose and regional programs must consider control and storage of both the surface and the underground resources, re-evaluation of the priority of water uses, and evaluation of the benefits of exchanging water between river basins.

The convention delegates opposed Pres. Nixon's order to cut scheduled new starts on water development projects.

- Land resources: Planning for urban land use must provide needed space for parks, low- and middle-income housing, schools, hospitals, recreation and other public facilities. An effective land policy must be developed to curb ruinous speculation and curtail escalating prices.
- Federal Public Land: Modern legislation and programs to provide stable, productive management in the public interest are needed to prevent resource deterioration of 180 million acres of public land in western states and 270 million acres in Alaska.
- Alaska: As a result of the immense oil discoveries on the Arctic North Slope, a national program is imperative with strict environmental controls, enabling the state to grow economically without utterly destroying the natural environment.
- Electric Power: Strict regulation in the public and consumer interest to assure a low-cost and reliable power supply is needed. The Electric Power Reliability Act now pending in Congress would help achieve that goal, as would a federal Utilities Consumer Counsel. Legislation among the states is needed to enable all utility workers to achieve the same kind of bargaining rights accorded to industrial workers in general. Wholesale power contracts should provide language protecting the rights of workers to bargain collectively.
- Shale Oil: Long-range oil shale development policy should safeguard leasing arrangements against monopoly. Revenues from any leasing programs should be used to help finance federal public sector programs.
- Monopoly in Natural Resources: Congress is urged to investigate the decline in competition and increasing control of major energy sources such as oil, oil shale and uranium by a few giant corporations.
- Minerals: An integrated policy on national minerals, raw material and energy is needed.
- Atomic Energy: Such issues as cost, uranium supply and pollution can only be resolved by balancing the nation's expanding future needs for electric power with development of nuclear reactors that will conserve a limited uranium resource and be so located, designed and operated to prevent pollution of the environment. Until the major problems of environmental effects, social and economic implications have been more adequately assessed, control of the AEC's Plowshare Program of low-yield underground explosions for peaceful uses should not be transferred to private industry.

More Curbs Urged On Strikebreaking

Atlantic City—Federal, state and local legislation to halt the importation of professional strikebreakers in labor disputes was urged by the AFL-CIO convention.

The resolution noted that 14 states and 108 municipalities have passed such citizens' job protection laws at the urging of the printing trades and other AFL-CIO affiliates. But in other areas, "professional strikebreaking remains a constant and virulent threat to the peace and security of all who work for a living," it said.

CONTRACTS for new nine-story building in Washington to be occupied by five AFL-CIO unions will be let next March, officers of the five-union consortium tell Federation Pres. George Meany at convention where model was on display. From the left, Pres. S. Frank Raftery of the Painters, Pres. John H. Lyons of the Iron Workers, and Meany. Others in United Unions, Inc., are the Bookbinders, Fire Fighters and Sheet Metal Workers.

Compensation Benefits Reflect States' Failures

Atlantic City—A record of "dismal failures" by state legislatures requires that the federal government set minimum standards for unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation, the AFL-CIO said.

Resolutions adopted by the convention praised AFL-CIO state and local central bodies for efforts to improve existing state laws in both areas but said results have been unsatisfactory.

The convention noted that Pres. Eisenhower, in 1954 and later years, urged states to extend coverage under unemployment insurance laws, to permit a great majority of workers to receive a weekly benefit equal to one-half their average weekly wage, and to allow benefits to be drawn for at least 26 weeks if needed.

When Eisenhower made his plea, the convention pointed out, no state met all of the objectives. "Today," it added, "15 years since his original plea and nine years since he left office only two states are close to meeting these objectives."

The resolution said that Pres. Nixon's recent proposals on jobless benefits, which included another call for states to meet the 50-percent average wage standard, would "do little to achieve" the goal of adequate unemployment compensation.

The convention reiterated labor's support for federal legislation that would include:

- Expansion of coverage to most of the workers now left out by state laws.
- Benefit ceilings raised to a level of two-thirds of the statewide average weekly wage.
- An extended benefit program for long-term unemployed workers with a steady work history, and at least 26 weeks of benefits for all eligible workers.
- Computation of benefits on the worker's full-time gross weekly earnings during those weeks of the base year when earnings were highest.
- Safeguards to prevent states from imposing overly restrictive qualifications for benefits.

The workmen's compensation resolution called upon Congress to "at long last recognize that separate state systems of workmen's compensation . . . are doomed to be inadequate."

A federal system, it said, must be created with these minimum provisions:

- Compulsory coverage of all workers, regardless of their occupations or the numerical size of the work-group to which they belong.
- Full protection for all forms of job-incurred accidents or ailments, including those that may not show up immediately.
- Weekly benefits of at least two-thirds normal full-time earnings; no unrealistic medical or hospital fees; safeguards to assure that every worker gets all of the benefits he is entitled to.

Overseas Aid Held Vital to World Peace

Atlantic City—The gap between the richer and poor nations will widen dangerously without "adequate American overseas aid," the AFL-CIO convention warned.

While 103 of the 139 independent states are "still devolping countries" in need of massive aid to make social and economic progress, "the very idea of American overseas aid is now in serious jeopardy," a resolution declared.

It noted that U.S. foreign aid has dipped from the almost 2 percent of gross national product during the Marshall Plan years to less than half of 1 percent of the Gross National Product proposed for fiscal 1970 by Pres. Nixon. This, the resolution said is proportionately well below Belgium, Britain, France, Germany and Holland.

"Overseas aid is not a cash handout," the convention said. "It should be, above all, a program for providing technical know-how, education, agriculture and better health.

"By helping the developing countries build vital economies geared to providing decent conditions of life and labor, our country will make a vital contribution to the maintenance of world peace and advancement of freedom."

Toward this end, the convention urged increased emphasis on expanding the activities of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, the African-American Labor Center, the Asian-American Free Labor Institute, and similar organizations that promote the building of democratic institutions such as free trade unions, cooperatives and private local impact projects.

Slogans Aren't Enough:

Massive Program Urged To Remedy Decay of Cities

Atlantic City—Decay is imbedded so deeply in American cities that only a well-coordinated attack touching every aspect of human life could possibly correct the situation, the AFL-CIO convention declared.

"There are no overnight solutions and instant panaceas that will resolve this complex of problems," a resolution said. "Slogans won't produce positive results."

The convention spelled out a multi-faceted program that calls for renewed effort for improvement in housing, employment, transportation, education, health services and the fight against air and water pollution.

Terming the housing shortage one of the key factors in the urban crisis, the convention called for one million new housing units for low- and middle-income families each year with an additional 300,000 units of low-rent public housing.

"At the core of the nation's housing crisis are the inflationary interest rates exacted by money lenders," the resolution charged. "Housing has been the principal casualty of the stifling effect of the tight money policy on the economy.

"As a result, the critical shortage of needed housing, instead of being relieved, has become more acute."

To provide mortgage money at reasonable rates, Congress was called on to authorize the Government National Mortgage Association to operate in tandem with the Federal National Mortgage Association and with private investors to provide a steady flow of capital financing for housing urgently needed by low- and moderate-income families. And the GNMA was urged to absorb the discount rather than pass it on to the consumer.

Study Called For

Similarly, the Veterans Administration should be authorized to invest its funds in VA-guaranteed mortgages and Congress should study the feasibility of earmarking a percentage of the Social Security Trust Fund for investment in mortgages, the convention said.

A national land policy is needed to curtail another part of the high cost of housing, it was noted. A land reserve should be set aside to meet national housing goals in the face of land costs that have risen from 12 percent of the price of the average home purchased in 1950 to above 20 percent in 1969.

If labor and safety standards are fully maintained, the AFL-CIO said it would welcome such new methods as prefabrication for the mass production of houses.

"However, to have a meaningful effect on the cost of low-income housing, the introduction of new technology must take place in a large volume, private market with full-scale support by all levels of government in the assemblage of large projects, a continuing public housing program and a continuity of mortgage money supply," the resolution stated.

New Communities

The convention also repeated the AFL-CIO's support of building new communities located at a distance from the inner city. These offer the opportunity to develop well-balanced communities which would keep abreast of the population increase. At the same time they would make possible large-scale relocations from the blighted areas of the inner city, thereby permitting demolition of a substantial number of structures that have outlived their usefulness, the convention suggested.

Employment was also cited as a major component of the solution to the cities' problems. The AFL-CIO program called for federal job training to equip disadvantaged workers with marketable skills and public service employment of those who cannot be absorbed into jobs by private industry.

The resolution also called for adequate federal grants to modernize, expand and reorganize the urban transportation systems. The present inadequacies of the transportation systems in most cities place a special burden on the city wage and salary earners, it was noted.

Education in the inner city should be upgraded through special incentives to teachers in slum areas, federal subsidy of more effective school-type programs and full use of school buildings for job training, adult education and community centers, the convention said.

"In addition, vocational training must be realistically geared to the modern job market," it was noted.

The national health care crisis was traced to "a progressive breakdown in the capability of the fee-for-service, solo practice, entrepreneurial health system to deliver health care where it is needed at locations convenient to the total population." All affiliated unions and health, welfare and pension funds were urged to promote the development of pre-paid group practice plans.

A program of environmental control was urged to help cities maintain pure water supplies and rid them of polluted air. But the program should also include plans to conserve green spaces in and around the cities as well as a step-up in the construction of such public facilities as libraries, playgrounds and cultural centers.

The convention declared that no city or state government can solve these problems alone, nor can private enterprise do it alone.

"Solutions to these problems require nationwide social and economic measures, with adequate federal funds and federal standards, and equally important the willingness of non-governmental institutions and of individuals to occupy themselves with the challenge of the urban crisis."

The AFL-CIO has accepted this challenge, the resolution observed, and it listed these examples of the federation's direct involvement in urban affairs:

- Creation of the Dept. of Urban Affairs to coordinate the federation's efforts.
- The AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust to enlist the investment of general treasury and pension funds of affiliates in a program for low- and middle-income housing.
- Establishment of the Human Resources Development Institute to expand labor's role in manpower programs.
- Major support for critical legislative actions.
- Support for the National Housing Conference.
- AFL-CIO participation in the Urban Coalition, a broad-based alliance of those concerned with the urban crisis.
- Sponsorship of more than 230 housing projects by AFL-CIO affiliates, all open to everyone without regard to race, color or creed.

Mass Transport Needs Set at $1 Billion a Year

Atlantic City—All citizens should have a low-fare, convenient and efficient transportation system supported by general tax funds as an alternative to the automobile, the AFL-CIO convention said.

To accomplish the task, the convention called for expansion of the Urban Mass Transportation Act with a total funding of not less than $1 billion a year over a 12-year period beginning with fiscal 1971.

But earmarked user charges would not work, the convention said, because the poor and underprivileged are the most dependent on public transportation since they cannot afford cars. Instead, the cost should be shared by all those who benefit from the availability of public transportation, the resolution said.

Noting that Administration proposals call for long-term financing, the AFL-CIO called on Congress to fund an on-going program to the full level of authorizations.

This could be accomplished, the convention said, through establishment of a mass transportation trust fund or through a system of advance appropriations that would assure future funding.

At the same time, the convention called for an accelerated program of capital investment to be accompanied by a carefully drawn new program of operating supplements. These should take into consideration the essential commuter requirements such as travel to and from job training centers, employment opportunities, health facilities, educational institutions and recreational and cultural facilities.

The convention also called for a program of expanded federal aid to "retain intact the pattern of financing, planning and substantive labor protection requirements presently in the Urban Mass Transportation Act."

Congress was urged to make it plain that the obligation to maintain labor standards includes the payment of prevailing wages to all workers. Such standards should also guarantee to rail and transit workers the first opportunity for employment in any new transportation system built with federal funds.

"In addition, we believe that the federal government should share in the costs of providing displacement allowances under employe arrangements approved by the Secretary of Labor," the resolution said.

To improve the nation's highways, the resolution called for a highway and freeway network designed with reserved bus lanes, grade-separated transit rights of way and the like to serve rail and bus transportation as well as the private automobile.

At the same time, a broadened highway program was urged to permit the use of earmarked funds for additional land acquisition and construction of a highway and freeway network.

Social Programs Stressed:

Anti-Poverty Drive Tied to Labor Goals

Atlantic City—The historic goals of the labor movement constitute a good share of the measures needed for the total elimination of poverty in America, an AFL-CIO convention resolution declared.

"We are not Johnny-come-latelys to the fight against poverty," the resolution said. "Organized labor has long had its anti-poverty program—full employment, a better minimum wage for more workers, basic improvements in social insurance, expanded job and training programs and a decent level of public assistance."

The convention also called for an expanded food stamp program and extension and strengthening of the Office of Economic Opportunity as other tools needed in the fight to eliminate want and deprivation.

There are still 25 million Americans below the government-defined poverty level of $3,500 a year, the convention noted, and one-third of them would be lifted out of poverty by raising the minimum wage to at least $2 an hour and extending its protection to all workers.

For others, the answer lies in substantial improvements in social insurance and a greatly improved welfare program, the convention said. A 50 percent increase, a $100 minimum benefit and other improvements were urged for the social security program. Federalization, or at least federal minimum standards, are needed in the unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation programs also were urged.

"Despite what may be good intentions," the resolution said, the Administration's welfare reform proposals do not meet the need. "The Administration would provide a $1,600 welfare payment for a family of four—only $30 a week. This is less than half of the official government poverty level. It would benefit families in only 10 states."

The public welfare system must be completely revised to provide a federal welfare program with adequate payments based on the sole criterion of need and with federal financing and administration of welfare costs, the convention declared.

New legislation on the food stamp program would help lift the 10 to 12 million hungry and undernourished Americans away from the prospects of brain damage, infant deaths, retarded learning and vulnerability to disease, the resolution said.

The proposals on the food stamp program include lower eligibility standards, cost-free distribution to the lowest income groups, federal payment of administrative costs of local programs where needed, prompter and simpler certification and distribution procedures, partial payment plans for those whose pay days do not coincide with issuance periods, broadening of the items for which stamps may be used, and simultaneous operation of the commodity distribution and food stamp programs when necessary.

In calling for the extension of the Economic Opportunity Act for "at least two years without crippling amendments," the resolution praised the Administration for seeking the extension, but criticized the lack of leadership in pressing Congress to Act on pending anti-poverty legislation.

"We further recognize that OEO has never been adequately funded," the convention said. "If the Administration intends to give leadership to the anti-poverty program, the program must be extended and strengthened."

The convention said this would require "substantially more" funds than the Administration has proposed and it also said that the anti-poverty program should not be placed under the control of the states.

Boycott Makes It Big With Supporters, Foes

Atlantic City—Dir. Cesar Chavez of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee offered several examples of the extent to which farm workers' organizing efforts and labor's boycott of California grapes has caught on.

For one thing, he told the AFL-CIO convention, "Right-to-Workers" in California have placed the boycott at the top of their "fear" list, replacing sex education.

Then there was the case of a little girl in a Washington, D.C., store who tugged at her mother's hand as they passed the grape display and asked "if she could have some boycotts."

Chavez said farm workers emphasize to the growers that "we are going to fight to get a union for as long as it takes." AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany assured Chavez that the federation will back the effort until it succeeds.

"We are quite familiar with long strikes and long struggles," Meany declared, "and we don't give up just because it takes a little time."

Commitment Renewed To Aid Farm Workers

Atlantic City—The commitment of labor to the cause of farm workers—10 years after the AFL-CIO launched its first farm organizing drive—"is more pronounced than ever before," the AFL-CIO declared.

A convention resolution pointed to areas of progress, including contracts won and improved upon, but it stressed that the organizational effort and labor's boycott of California table grapes must continue.

The future of farm workers, the resolution said, is more dependent than ever "on the help they must have from their brother and sister trade unionists."

The delegates commended the farm workers for their "courage and perseverance" in the struggle to gain their rights. Organizations outside labor also were thanked for their efforts "on behalf of this, the youngest family in the AFL-CIO."

Turning to the future, the convention called upon every affiliate, every leader and every union member "to make the farm workers' cause their cause."

The goal, the convention said, should be one "of keeping fresh grapes off of every union table and out of every union shopping basket."

At the same time, the convention pledged the AFL-CIO to continued "vigorous support" of the farm workers' organizing drive and legislation to bring them under the protection of the National Labor Relations Act.

The story of the farm workers' grape strike, now in its fifth year, "has become the story of the national boycott of grapes," the resolution said.

Since the 1967 convention, it noted, the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee "has virtually decimated" its manpower in California to send leaders to promote the boycott throughout the nations.

AFL-CIO leadership, the resolution pointed out, has rallied behind the effort everywhere and "every element of the liberal progressive community has responded favorably to this great crusade."

But equally vigorous in fighting the boycott "has been the enemy, the supporters of these backward growers who reject collective bargaining concepts long accepted by other industries," the resolution said.

It noted that the "radical right," the National Right-to-Work Committee, the John Birch Society and the American Farm Bureau Federation are aligned with the growers.

In speaking for the resolution, Larry Itliong, UFWOC assistant director, declared, "It is not enough that we fight the growers and the employes, but we fight the financial institutions of this country, and we cannot win by ourselves."

"We need your help, brothers," he said, "we need your help and the help of your entire family not to buy grapes and not to eat grapes until such time as we win this strike on behalf of farm workers."

CESAR CHAVEZ

Cures Sought On Abuse Of 'Green Cards'

Atlantic City—Government action to stop U.S. employers from hiring Mexican "green card" workers to deflate wages and work as strikebreakers was urged by the AFL-CIO convention.

The "green carders" are Mexicans who are lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence but still maintain homes in Mexico while commuting to U.S. jobs.

A convention resolution said that the commuters are being hired as a means of "undermining the wages and working conditions of U.S. citizens."

Further, the resolution stated, the "green card" workers are being used as strikebreakers and as a source of "unfair competition with workers seeking to organize on farms and factories in the United States."

The convention called on Congress to enact pending legislation that would permit issuance of "green card" certifications only where it is found that the workers are not being used to undercut wages or working conditions or employed to break strikes.

The resolution also asked the Dept. of Justice to crack down on illegal entry of workers who similarly are being hired to depress U.S. employment standards.

Stop Undercutting

The department, the resolution continued, should likewise curb its issuance of 72-hour passes to Mexicans, a procedure "which adds to the influx of workers who undermine and undercut U.S. wages and working conditions."

The Dept. of Labor and all government agencies, the resolution concluded, should also ensure that those who are legally admitted to the United States are "protected by its laws, including fair labor standards, social security and the right to organize."

Meat Cutters Supported on Two Boycotts

Atlantic City—Consumer boycotts launched by the Meat Cutters against two midwest companies were endorsed by the AFL-CIO in convention resolutions.

Union members are on strike at three plants of Poultry Packers, Inc., and the convention urged union families not to buy the company's Blue Star label products. The company sells about 70 percent of its products to the armed services.

Another resolution backed the boycott against Iowa Beef Packers, Inc., which has been struck since Aug. 24. The company has been known as a foe of organized labor and uses non-union firms for its construction work.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany wired the company of the convention's action and urged them to come to the bargaining table and negotiate a contract.

Delegates Pledge Backing to CARE

Atlantic City—The "fullest possible financial support" of CARE programs was pledged by the AFL-CIO convention.

"The AFL-CIO was one of the founding agencies of CARE 23 years ago and has ever since taken a full share in the development of programs and policies under which CARE has distributed nearly $1 billion worth of aid among the needy of some 60 countries throughout the free world," the resolution pointed out.

Overhaul of Rural Programs Asked To Solve Poverty Amid Abundance

Atlantic City—Rapid changes in agriculture require a reevaluation and overhauling of existing public programs to remove the paradox of rural poverty in the midst of rural abundance, the AFL-CIO convention said.

Today, farm workers are among the most exploited members of the work force, the convention said, and rising agricultural productivity has displaced several million marginal farmers. As a result, many rural farm communities have been left in a state of economic distress, it noted.

The resolution pointed out that there were 4 million farms in 1959, but today there are only 3 million and the 300,000 largest account for nearly two-thirds of total agricultural sales.

With the help of an ever-increasing technology, less than 5 percent of the nation's labor force produces more food and fibre than America can consume, the convention noted.

The decade of the 1960s has seen some unprecedented improvements, the resolution said, yet poverty characterizes rural areas, especially on Indian reservations, in Appalachia and in the South and Southwest. Farm workers are among the most exploited members of the work force, it noted.

Too little aid is reaching those most in need, the convention said. It cited large federal subsidies to profitable agri-business farms, often owned by corporations and absentees. Also, wealthy hobby farmers are aided by tax loopholes and there is no comprehensive program for retraining and re-employment of those displaced from agriculture.

To correct this unbalanced picture, the convention called for:

- Reasonable ceilings on the amount of federal aid paid to any farm.
- Appropriate efforts by farmers to bargain collectively for a reasonable price since they must sell in markets dominated by a few buyers who enjoy superior bargaining power.
- Enactment of a bill introduced by Sen. Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.) to curtail tax loopholes for hobby farmers.
- Extension to farm workers of the protections long afforded other workers—coverage by the National Labor Relations Act, Fair Labor Standards Act, state unemployment and workmen's compensation laws and other federal and state protective and social welfare legislation.
- Special programs of housing, education, health and day care centers for rural inhabitants, especially migrants.
- Expansion of the approach used in the Appalachia regional program.
- An end to discrimination against minority groups.
- A federally-supported public service employment program to create useful jobs for the hard-core unemployed and seriously underemployed in rural, as well as urban, areas.

Full Funds Asked For Arts Program

Atlantic City—"The arts in a democracy must not be the playthings of the rich," the AFL-CIO convention said in calling for government at all levels to nurture the artistic and cultural life of the nation.

The convention cited the increase in leisure time and growing urbanization as making it increasingly important that opportunities be expanded for involvement in and appreciation of the arts.

The National Endowment for the Arts is an example of what the nation can and must do to support the arts, the resolution said.

'Not While We Breathe'

I THINK WE HAVE MADE great progress. I think the condition of the movement is good. We have better contracts for our workers through the national unions and local unions than we ever had before. In the final analysis that is the purpose of this movement, to build up the standards of life of the people we represent, and as we build up those standards of life we cannot but help to build up the standards for the entire country, for all of the people of this great nation.

I am supremely confident that this movement can do its job, that irrespective of what Administration is in Washington, irrespective of who is in the White House, whether he is a particular friend of ours or not, that we can protect the interests of the great mass of wage earners in this country, the interest of the people who belong to our unions or, perhaps more important, the interests of all of those who work for wages.

I take pride in the fact that we are known in Washington as the people's lobby. I am sure, from the actions of this Convention, that we will continue to be that people's lobby and we will continue to protect the interests of the great mass of American wage earners. If we do that we are making the finest contribution that we can make to the future success of our great country.

—From an address by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the eighth convention.

(I HAVE) a number of basic convictions: that freedom is the permanent human value, that it is not the proper subject of styles or of new systems of logic or thought or of passing convenience; that the cause that we are all bound together in, the cause of human progress, is worth our best steel—it is even worth our marlin spikes, our knees, our elbows and our claws.

And I have learned that when you work for the people there is no virtue in being a good loser. There is no value in the kind of soft statesmanship or pious forbearance that dignifies the person at the expense of the people.

In this federation, this brotherhood, we do represent the best aspirations of the working people of America. We are the main enduring force in the struggle for human progress.

We are blessed and strengthened by one piece of sure and certain knowledge, that there are no lost causes for us; that the fight is never over; that as long as we stand together and the blood is in us there can be no final defeat on any battleground.

Though we may lose a round, and another and another and another, we will always be back again and again, whether it be in a November election, a 14b vote, a Stevens cotton mill, a Kingsport Press or a western vineyard, and we are going to win because we are not going to quit.

Not today, not tomorrow, not while we breathe.

Urged to Withdraw:

Haynsworth Lacks Sensitivity To Rights of Workers, Negroes

The following is excerpted from a resolution adopted by the eighth AFL-CIO convention on the nomination of Judge Haynsworth to the U.S. Supreme Court.

JUDGE HAYNSWORTH'S RECORD with respect to labor-management cases demonstrates clearly that he has no sensitivity to the basic rights of working men and women.

Judge Haynsworth's record with respect to civil rights cases demonstrates clearly that he has no sensitivity to the basic citizenship rights of Americans, without regard to the color of their skins.

We are not naive enough not to realize that appointments to all federal offices—judiciary and executive, alike—reflect the political climate in this country. We recognize that there was an election in 1968, and that as a result of that election there was a change in Administrations in Washington. We recognize the right of an American President to choose, as his appointees, from among those who have supported his cause and who reflect his own political coloration.

We submit, however, that the nomination of Judge Haynsworth goes far beyond those bounds. The 1968 election was decided, in large measure, on the basis of a so-called "Southern Strategy." And the proposal that Judge Haynsworth be named to one of the nine most responsible positions on the Supreme Court is at once both a reward for those who made this strategy of 1968 a success and an investment in the maintenance of this southern base into the future.

On the record, Judge Haynsworth has demonstrated his hostility to trade unions and his hostility to civil rights—and either of these grounds should be cause enough for the Senate of the United States to reject his nomination.

But there is another reason which makes it clear that Judge Haynsworth is totally unqualified to participate in the deliberations of our highest judicial body—and that is the appalling lack of ethical judgment displayed by Judge Haynsworth in failing to insulate his judicial affairs from his financial affairs.

Daily, the record grows as to the number of instances in which he has been shown to have financial interests—some of them most substantial—in companies which have been parties to suits on which Judge Haynsworth has been called to adjudicate.

What is even worse, the full extent of interrelationship between Clement Haynsworth, businessman and investor, and Clement Haynsworth, supposedly impartial judge, may not now be known—nor may it ever be known. For added to Judge Haynsworth's insensitivity to the legal niceties or the proprieties of the bench has been his amazing and continued lack of candor with the Senate and with the American people. Not once has he come forward, on his own, to lay the full extent of his financial transactions before the public. Instead, he has admitted to these involvements only reluctantly, and only after they have been uncovered by others and spread on the record by others.

WITHIN THE PAST YEAR, Mr. Justice Fortas made similar denials about wrongdoing in the commingling of his financial and judicial affairs, and without making any judgment here on the Fortas case, the fact of the matter is that, as the result of those disclosures, Justice Fortas no longer sits on our highest court. Those who were loudest in their criticism of Justice Fortas said at that time that the appearance of impartiality was as important as impartiality, itself.

We agree. As we said earlier, judges must be above suspicion and beyond reproach. Yet the same men who criticized Justice Fortas now seek to alibi Judge Haynsworth with the result that their own ethics, as well as those of their candidate for the Supreme Court, are called into question.

There is more than an individual appointment at stake here. What is at issue is fundamental to our democracy. If Judge Haynsworth should be appointed to the Supreme Court, it would be necessary for the American people to scrutinize his stock portfolio every time a case came before the court. And even then, on the basis of what has been revealed about Judge Haynsworth's activities in the past, it is questionable whether all of the facts would ever be known—and the American people would be left with the nagging doubt as to exactly how impartial Judge Haynsworth's decisions really were.

Now, therefore, be it

RESOLVED: That the AFL-CIO calls on Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., to withdraw himself from consideration for this appointment; that, failing voluntary action on the part of Judge Haynsworth, we call upon Pres. Nixon to withdraw the nomination to safeguard our judicial system; and that, failing these actions, we call upon the Senate of the United States not to consent to the nomination.

Hits Administration 'Retreat':

Labor Affirms Commitment To Civil Rights Progress

Atlantic City—Accusing the Administration of a "retreat" on civil rights, the AFL-CIO convention vowed to "continue the unity of labor, liberal and civil rights forces" as well as "eliminating any vestige of discrimination that may remain in labor's house."

The convention said it was no exaggeration to say that the great civil rights gains that have been made are in peril today because of the policies of the Administration.

The Administration has retreated from the struggle for school desegregation and failed to press for a simple five-year extension of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, the convention charged.

This retreat in civil rights enforcement is being "covered" by an attempt to make a whipping boy of unions, the resolution said.

"It is part of a calculated strategy of accommodating conservative elements in the South while at the same time trying to divide minorities, labor and liberals who have been the backbone of the effort to achieve progress in civil rights," the convention said.

Specifically, the Administration was accused of an "unsound double standard" in attempting to deal with the legitimate problem of expanding the opportunities for minority-group workers in higher paid skilled and technical jobs.

The so-called Philadelphia Plan for quotas in the hiring of minority-group members on federal construction projects was described as setting up "unsound procedures" used in no other industry, segment of the labor market or the government itself.

"The excuse for this is the low percentage of Negroes and other minorities in the construction industry," the convention said, "but in most cases, the figures that have been used for justification have been erroneous.

"For example, in Philadelphia, government officials implied that less than 2 percent of building trades membership were minority-group workers. The facts are that over 30 percent of Philadelphia building trades members are Negro, and excluding Laborers, 12 percent of all journeymen are Negro.

"Government figures on white collar occupations and in industries such as textile, banking and newspaper show far less overall minority-group participation than in construction and no higher percentage in skilled categories," the resolution continued. "There is no excuse for the Administration to play a 'numbers game' as they did in the Philadelphia Plan publicity.

"Falsely portraying the facts won't help minorities get jobs or end discrimination."

While the convention voiced pride in the AFL-CIO's record in civil rights, it said all international unions, state federations and central bodies must insure that active civil rights committees work toward eliminating any remaining vestige of discrimination.

The resolution cited the progress in civil rights over the past 15 years and traced labor's role in support of such measures as the fair employment practice section of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, which created the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

"Today, the AFL-CIO strongly supports efforts to strengthen the EEOC by giving it cease-and-desist powers needed to make it more effective," the resolution noted. "The Administration is opposed, seeking enforcement in the federal district courts.

"Here as in the school desegregation situation, the Administration moves in a direction that the civil rights movement can only view as dilatory and ineffective.

"Nor has the AFL-CIO limited its efforts to the legislative front," the resolution said, citing union-sponsored affirmative action programs which have brought significant results.

"Specifically in the construction industry, the AFL-CIO has worked with the Building Trades Dept., international unions, local building trades councils and groups like the Workers Defense League-A. Philip Randolph Education Fund Committee, the Urban League's LEAP program and other community groups," the convention noted.

"The results speak for themselves. By July of 1969, 4,248 minority-group apprentices were placed by Outreach Programs. Of these 3,958 were in building and construction trades apprenticeship programs.

"The bulk of these were not in the so-called 'trowel trades.' Electricians, carpenters, iron workers, plumbers, steamfitters and sheet metal workers accounted for 2,293 of these apprentices."

Overall, minority-group apprentices in the construction industry have increased from less than 2.5 percent in 1960 to 7.2 percent last year, the resolution said.

It noted that the policy statement of the Executive Council of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. reaffirms the stand against discrimination and calls for the acceleration and extension of Apprenticeship Outreach programs.

Programs for workers who are neither apprentices nor journeymen are also encouraged in an appeal to local councils to "explore and vigorously pursue training programs for the upgrading of minority workers."

"The implementation of this excellent statement is a sound basis for bringing increased participation by minority-group workers in skilled jobs in the construction industry," the AFL-CIO said, "especially in those locals which now have low participation rates."

The convention noted the comprehensive civil rights legislation enacted during the Kennedy-Johnson Administrations to eliminate discrimination in public accommodations, voting, education, employment, housing and the administration of justice.

"But despite this progress, there are no grounds for complacency," the resolution said. "The increasing crisis proportions of problems in our cities, the abnormally high rates of unemployment among Negro and other minorities and the remaining pockets of discrimination are festering sores.

"It would be idle and tragic to ignore them or pretend that they will go away," the convention said.

SALUTE to the AFL-CIO for its work on behalf of sanitation workers in Memphis, farm workers in California and hospital workers in South Carolina was voiced by Bayard Rustin at the convention. Rustin is executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

Bayard Rustin Warns Against Racial Division

Atlantic City—Civil Rights leader Bayard Rustin told the AFL-CIO convention that both sides will lose if black and white workers allow themselves to be diverted from such goals as adequate jobs, housing and education for every American.

Rustin quoted the Wall Street Journal as saying recent attacks by civil rights groups against the building trades unions in such cities as Chicago and Pittsburgh were carefully timed. The demonstrators knew, Rustin said, that contractors would be sympathetic to demands for expansion of union hiring and training efforts in hope that it might "slow inflation in construction by increasing the supply of workers."

"That is a very fancy sentence," Rustin said. "But, baby, that simply means 'Let's cut some wages, let's use the building trades to do it and let's aggravate the Negro to attack them in order to achieve that little bit.'"

Rustin, the executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, said that no civil rights group would knowingly take such a position. "We know that it is pointless and self-defeating to get more Negroes into industries which are skilled jobs and well-paying, only to have the wages in that industry decline," he said. "What the hell would you want in for, only to have the wages drop?"

"Some unscrupulous interests," he continued, have mounted a propaganda campaign to blame labor for the high cost of home building and other socially-needed construction.

Diversionary Move

"They want to divert attention from the profiteering of the large corporations and the tight-money bankers and the real estate interests, from the economic policies of the Nixon Administration," Rustin said. "They would divert us and our attention from the dismal record in integrating black Americans into the decision-making process."

The Administration, he said, is "playing a game we had better watch."

He asked if it weren't "interesting that they get so interested in getting Negroes into the building trades but couldn't get a Negro into the Cabinet of the United States?

"Isn't it devilish, and how can you explain, that at the very moment the federal government dares to say it will get blacks in, they talk about cutting 75 percent of federal construction?"

While praising the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. for its resolutions on increasing the number of minority-group journeymen and apprentices in the trades, he declared that "there must now be forthright action. There must be visible results, for policy statements are never read in the ghetto and they cannot close the credibility gap."

"Black people have had 350 years of statements where often things did not really happen," Rustin said, and warned against any "foot-dragging and evasion."

He said those who say black people have made no progress don't know what they are talking about. "Of course we have made much progress," Rustin said, "but the problem we face is that progress is relative, as every trade unionist knows."

The difficulty today, he went on, lies in the twin evils of black rage and white fear. "These two things feed on each other and they set this nation on a collision course.

"I believe there are people in this country who want us to be on a collision course. First there is a small handful who want this collision because they see it as the first act of a revolutionary drama of their fantasies. But they are a small and sick and sorry lot, with an inflated notion of their strength which comes from seeing themselves too often on television.

"But there are more powerful lots. They are not on the left but the right. This group knows that revolution by fanatics will not succeed, but they would use this threat as a pretext for an assault, not only on black people, but first of all on the trade union movement, on social legislation, on civil liberties. They would seize on the fear of the future to draw us back into the past.

"The only answer is adequate housing, adequate jobs, adequate education for all," Rustin declared. "Then the white fear and the black rage can be contained."

He had high praise for COPE, which he said performed a miracle in the 1968 elections. And he saluted the AFL-CIO "for the work it has done for the sanitation workers in Memphis, for farm workers in Delano and for hospital workers in South Carolina."

Convention Calls for Consolidating Sprawling Manpower Programs

Atlantic City—Federal manpower programs have grown up helter-skelter over the past eight years and should be consolidated into a centrally-directed administration, the AFL-CIO convention said.

Manpower programs are now servicing 1 million unemployed and underemployed persons each year as compared with almost none in 1961, the convention noted, but this has not been sufficient to meet the nation's needs.

The convention praised the action of the Executive Council in creating the Human Resources Development Institute, a federally-funded, non-profit corporation operated by the AFL-CIO to help unions participate in manpower programs at the community level.

HRDI has trained staff members in 50 major cities and it has effectively carried forward its goals in its first 10 months, the convention noted.

As the first step in removing the overlapping jurisdictions that are handicapping manpower programs, the convention recommended the federalization of the U.S. Employment Service. At present, the service is patterned on state and local boundary lines and does not offer the fullest service, the convention declared.

It also detailed the changes that should be made in the employment service in the interim before federalization.

Existing manpower programs were criticized for directing too many workers toward entry-level, low-paying jobs instead of helping individuals to upgrade their skills.

"In too many instances, manpower activities have been viewed as a substitute for welfare programs with the result that neither need, manpower or welfare, has been adequately met," the convention said.

While the Administration has recognized some of the problems, including the need for consolidation, it has not supported the needed public-service, job-creation program, it was noted.

The convention called for public service employment that would provide hundreds of thousands of jobs for the hard-core unemployed and at the same time provide needed services in hospitals, schools, police and fire departments and recreational and sanitation facilities.

Congress was urged to pass the legislation proposed by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) to create such a program.

In other manpower recommendations, the convention called for:

- Federal relocation allowances to assist unemployed workers who wish to move to areas of job opportunity.
- A ban on the use of public funds to reimburse employers for costs that previously had been considered a part of normal operating expense.
- Sharp curtailment of programs that provide training for low-wage jobs that require no special skill at the time of hiring.
- Rigorous enforcement of the prohibition on any program that helps employers shift locations.
- Continued use of regional manpower advisory committees, which should include representatives of all interested groups, including organized labor.

Support Renewed For Hearst Strike

Atlantic City—The union-busting effort of Publisher George Hearst, Jr., in Los Angeles must be defeated, the AFL-CIO said.

The Federation convention reiterated AFL-CIO support for striking and locked-out employes of the Los Angeles Herald-Examiner and urged its affiliates and central bodies to continue financial aid and cooperation.

Stronger Ties to American Labor Stressed by Fraternal Delegates

Atlantic City—Fraternal delegates to the AFL-CIO convention from Canada and England described problems that face workers in their countries and pledged their labor movements to strengthen their ties to American labor.

"I am confident that our friendly relations with the AFL-CIO will play no small part in helping us reach our objectives," declared Gerard Rancourt, executive vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress.

Two fraternal delegates from Britain's 9-million-member Trades Union Congress expressed similar sentiments.

Sidney F. Greene, general secretary of the National Union of Railwaymen, stressed that close cooperation between U.S. and British labor "can benefit workers throughout the world."

F. F. Smith, general secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Woodworkers, said British labor hopes "to continue to gain enormously from the advice and counsel" of U.S. labor.

"But it will not be one-way traffic," he added. "We are ready to make our contribution so that you and we together can help each other and the rest of mankind."

Rancourt pointed out that 70 percent of Canada's union members are in international unions "for very good reason" — most of Canadian industry is owned and controlled by interests outside of Canada, and mostly in the United States.

"In the face of these circumstances," he said, "it is only common sense for workers, employed by the same company and often making the same products, sometimes for the same market, to have the same union."

In the present era of spreading international corporate empires and conglomerate mergers, it is essential that trade union structures be adapted to follow the development, Rancourt emphasized.

"Ties between free national trade union centers all over the world must be tightened," he said. "No centers, however large or small, can afford to isolate themselves."

The challenges to labor in Canada are "much the same" as those facing U.S. unions, Rancourt said.

Workers are being hurt by inflation and "wrongly blamed for it; unions are being asked to reduce wage goals even as profits soar; there are threats of new legislation to weaken unions," he said.

Greene, who also is chairman of the TUC general council, noted that there have been strains between the TUC and the labor government due to its pricing and wage policies, but the differences are being resolved.

The government generally "is in line with the British trade union movement" and "it is taking steps in the right direction to try to solve the economic problems in the country," he added.

American labor's goals of seeking reduced unemployment, expanded education, improved social welfare and solutions to urban problems are so similar to the objectives of British unions "they could be put into the program of the TUC," Greene said.

British unions are making changes to equip themselves to deal with automation, expand wage scales, develop health programs "and improve and extend their educational services," Smith told the convention.

In the process, he said, the main concern is "not to gain the approval of newspaper owners, television pundits or employers" but to effectively carry out "the tasks our predecessors took up many decades ago."

"Our primary responsibility, as it always has been, is to the working people," he stated.

Convention Backs Fire Safety Panel

Atlantic City — The AFL-CIO called on Congress to establish a national commission on fire prevention and control with the appropriation of funds needed to implement the Fire Research & Safety Act which was adopted last year.

The United States is the only major country in the world that has no national commission on fire safety, it was noted in a resolution urging development of an extensive program in fire research and safety. It further called for educational and training programs, and the use of safety principles in construction.

More Funds Needed:

'Massive' Program Urged in Education

Atlantic City—The American labor movement called for a "significant increase" in federal funds for education.

The money is needed, the AFL-CIO convention said, to finance "a massive national effort to provide quality education for all Americans—children, youths and adults—wherever they may live, whatever their race or national background, whatever their family income."

The present level of federal support has saved the nation's schools from disaster and brought about impressive progress. But the convention resolution warned that nearly every city faces a financial crisis and neither state nor city funds are adequate to meet growing needs.

It expressed "serious concern" about the Administration's policy —or lack of policy—towards education. "The Administration appears to be drifting aimlessly and the drift has been largely in the wrong direction," the convention said.

"When educational needs are greater than ever, the Administration has pressed for reduced federal expenditures in the field of education," it noted.

Congress has partially recognized the need in authorizing funds for education. But, the resolution stressed, it has not met the need by appropriating the money. Less than half the amount authorized has actually been appropriated.

Continued improvement in vocational education is of special concern to organized labor, the resolution noted. Too often, it said, vocational schools have been regarded as a "dumping ground" for poor students.

An important role of schools is to prepare all students "for the realities of the world of work," the convention said.

It called for "comprehensive organization of schools which bring together general education and vocational education" from elementary grades through junior college.

This approach, it suggested, "by giving all students at least some experience in skill training and by giving all students a solid foundation in English, mathematics, sciences and social sciences, can do much to restore the dignity of labor, a concept which has often been lost in the schools of the past."

The resolution noted that some large cities are moving in the direction of decentralization with various degrees of community participation.

This can be useful in bringing greater flexibility to education, the resolution said. But it warned that unions must be watchful that decentralization does not become a disguised means of re-segregating schools or "simply a vehicle by which a few noisy people can dominate the schools." And, it stressed, "decentralization of schools must not be used to undermine existing collective bargaining agreements."

Too many textbooks still deal inadequately with the role of organized labor in America.

"On the positive side," it continued, "some school systems are beginning to include comprehensive units on organized labor in their curriculums, and we urge the further growth of this trend."

The convention reiterated labor's position that free public education should extend beyond the present pattern of 12 years of schooling.

Free education should be available at least two years beyond high school, and through a variety of programs every person should have an opportunity to obtain higher education.

The present federal program of loans to college students has been helpful, the resolution noted. "But they are clearly not a sufficient answer to the mounting costs of higher education."

Expanded adult education programs were also urged by the convention. And the resolution suggested that "training workers for effective leadership in their unions deserves a place alongside other federally financed adult training programs."

Bigger Role Sought for U.S. Vessels In Blueprint for Maritime Industry

Atlantic City—A blueprint for the rejuvenation of the American maritime industry was drafted by the AFL-CIO aimed at bringing more passengers and cargo tonnage aboard U.S.-flag ships.

Delegates to the eighth federation convention called on the Administration and Congress to develop and expand an effective national maritime policy that will improve the country's position in foreign commerce and serve as a powerful producer in the economy.

The convention urged Congress and the President to develop programs that will enable the nation to take full economic, strategic and psychological advantage of a first-rate American-flag passenger fleet.

It also expressed concern over the "effective control" concept on runaway ships that allows mercenary U.S. corporations to move much more tonnage with foreign-flag ships than goes to the U.S. merchant fleet.

"The lack of an adequate merchant marine is detrimental to our foreign commerce, weakens our efforts to maintain a strong peace program and threatens our national security," the resolution stressed.

It called on the Administration and Congress for a declaration that at least 50 percent of the country's foreign trade should be carried on American ships.

More realistic consideration of U.S.-flag merchant seapower in future military and defense planning by the Dept. of Defense is also needed, the convention declared.

Meanwhile, the Soviet Union's seapower program "is already making great headway toward capturing the world's foreign commerce and controlling the commerce of many nations—in accordance with their announced plans," the resolution pointed out.

The convention called for a U.S. flag merchant marine program that among other things will:

- Support and sustain the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 as "the national instrument of maritime policy" with cautious modification where needed.
- Modifying the act to provide capital reserve or special reserve privileges for dry bulk carriers similar to those enjoyed by subsidy contract berth lines and to extend this provision to Great Lakes shipping.
- Exert effort for a United Nations conference of all world powers to work out rules of international law on the use of the seas.
- Support the principle of essential trade routes, but also provide for adjustment in maximum and minimum sailings and for modifying ports of call, along with broader trade route determinations.
- Build 50 new commercial ships a year under the Construction Differential Subsidy section of the 1936 act.
- Support revitalization of the fishing industry through restrictions on imports and increased government assistance in finances and technology.
- Provide for the construction of at least three up-to-date nuclear powered commercial ships.
- Give top government priority to research of the oceans as a source of raw materials and food to meet the needs of the population explosion.
- Eliminate the shortage of U.S. flag petroleum tankers, which is viewed as a major weakness in the nation's security because of the dependence on foreign flag ships to haul oil for military use in Viet Nam. The resolution urged a commitment of 50 percent of oil imports to U.S. flag ships.

The resolution also stressed the fuller use of the cost equalization parity concept of the 1936 act for both ship operation and construction. It called for direct government subsidy to shipyards.

The convention called on the Maritime Administration to insist that passenger ship operators fulfill their commitments to maintain and replace passenger vessels.

It noted that American flag passenger ships directly provide 8,000 jobs plus many more in the shoreside industries. They also contribute about $100 million a year toward the balance of payments.

Labor Studies Center Issues Catalogue

Atlantic City — The catalogue for the first academic year of the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center was distributed to delegates at the convention.

A staff development program will be offered during the initial stages of the center's operations. The first of the three-week courses are scheduled to begin Dec. 1 in subjects on American unionism and history, economics, studies in the American social structure and effective reading to increase speed and comprehension.

Subsequent institutes will be open to full-time union staff members in the specialized fields of civil rights, social security, labor education, urban affairs, state and local central bodies, international affairs, organizing, and political and legislative activities.

The brochure also details procedures for enrollment, listing the dates and subjects offered at the institutes.

To Resist Threats:

Support Pledged To Free Nations

By Duane Emme

Atlantic City—The AFL-CIO convention renewed labor's firm commitment to helping free nations and free unions resist communism's "imperialist drive" and threats from other dictatorships.

Dangers to peace and freedom "gravely concern the American people," the delegates declared in adopting a series of resolutions covering the world's troubled areas.

The convention noted with approval the efforts being made by Pres. Nixon to bring the war in Viet Nam to an end by negotiating an honorable peace.

At the same time, a resolution warned that "the cause of peace can never be helped by division at the highest level of our government or by the call for unilateral American withdrawal" from Viet Nam.

Division and cries for a pull-out, it added, will "only encourage the North Viet Nam regime to continue the war and count on its sooner or later forcing our country to accept its demand for American capitulation."

The resolution reaffirmed American labor's solidarity with the Vietnamese Confederation of Labor (CVT) and saluted its "steadfast endeavors for the cause of democracy and social justice."

The convention condemned the 1968 Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia, the continuing occupation of that country and the recent purge of Alexander Dubcek and other Czechoslovak leaders "who dared raise their voices for liberalization."

The federation called for the immediate withdrawal of all Warsaw Pact troops from Czechoslovak soil and urged the U.S. government to press for withdrawal in any bilateral talks with Moscow and in the United Nations.

The convention assured "the brave people of Czechoslovakia, and especially their courageous workers fighting for free and democratic trade unions, of the sympathy and solidarity of the American labor movement."

The AFL-CIO denounced the Soviet government's new doctrine of granting only "limited sovereignty" to Communist countries while reserving for Moscow the right to intervene in their affairs as it pleases.

This policy, the federation emphasized, is a strong roadblock to any eventual reunification of Germany in freedom because it demands "the preservation of East Germany as a 'socialist state.'"

Turning to the Middle East, the convention appealed to the U.S. government to provide Israel with aircraft, tanks and all the means she needs "to defend herself and prevent another war which might lead to a world conflagration."

The resolution also asked the United States to provide Israel with economic aid "to help her carry the enormous burden on her economy as a result of the continued hostility by the Arabs."

In this connection, the delegates condemned guerrilla attacks on Israel—backed by Nasser, Moscow and Peiping—as attempts to disrupt Israel's economy, terrorize her people and prevent a peaceful settlement of the Arab-Israel conflict.

In expressing "deep concern" over air piracy in the Middle East, the convention asked the United States to press for release of two Israeli civilians being held in a Syrian jail after being abducted from an American passenger plane.

The resolution called upon the UN to survey the conditions of the Arab population in Israeli-occupied territory and the Jewish minority in Arab lands with a view toward making recommendations to eliminate unjust treatment wherever found.

The AFL-CIO welcomed Nixon's recent talks with Israeli Prime Minister Golda Meir as a "demonstration of friendship" between America and Israel, as well as the President's emphasis on the need for a negotiated peace settlement.

On Latin America, the AFL-CIO further underscored its support for the concept of the Alliance for Progress initiated by Pres. Kennedy to strengthen the economies of free nations.

"Towards this end," a resolution declared, "the labor movement of the United States must spare no effort to help the Latin American and Caribbean trade unions play their rightful role in building their homelands into increasingly stable democracies."

The nature and experience of the U.S. labor movement, it added, "enables us to stimulate and assist activities by the great mass of people—the workers . . . who are responsive to self-help initiatives."

The convention cited the AFL-CIO Impact Projects and the American Institute for Free Labor Development's social and educational programs as having been of "real assistance to campesinos and city workers" in helping them further democratic institutions.

Through AIFLD, ORIT (the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers) and union-to-union programs, U.S. labor "will rally all-out support for the triumph of democracy and social justice throughout the Americas," the delegates concluded.

Ghana Change Hailed

A convention resolution hailed the transfer of government from military to civilian rule in Ghana as "the most welcome development in Africa in recent years."

After being under military rule for 43 months following the overthrow of the Nkrumah dictatorship, the Ghanian people will now have civilian government with a democratic constitution, the resolution noted.

It supported fully "all humanitarian efforts to aid the victims of the tragic war" between the federal government of Nigeria and the secessionist province of Biafra.

At the same time, the convention reaffirmed its support of the need for restoring and maintaining Nigerian national unity—a position taken by the AFL-CIO two years ago.

In reasserting the expression of the 1967 convention, attention was called to the entrance of the Soviets into the Nigerian picture.

This incursion, it was noted, is partially due to the "hesitation and reluctance on the part of the western world to support the federal government in deed as well as in word."

Council Backed On ICFTU Stand

Atlantic City—The Executive Council's efforts to resolve the differences between the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the AFL-CIO in the interest of free world labor unity were approved by the convention.

The convention endorsed the Council's statement of last May 14 on the difficulties in the federation's relationship with the ICFTU.

Exploitation of Domestics By Agencies Denounced

Atlantic City—The plight of the nation's 2.5 million household workers was called to the attention of Congress by the AFL-CIO convention.

The convention urged measures to protect domestic workers from the predatory practices of private employment agencies that lure women from rural areas and foreign countries with attractive job offers. In fact there are often no jobs or the available jobs are extremely low-paid drudgery, the resolution said.

As a result the nation's domestics have an average annual wage of $1,300 a year. Yet 40 percent of them are heads of households.

Without the protection normally afforded workers in industry, such as protection under the Fair Labor Standards Act, workmen's compensation and unemployment insurance, these women work without basic fringe benefits, it was noted.

The exploitation of domestics by employment agencies includes exorbitant fees for job placement and charges for services that are available free from community agencies. The convention urged establishment of non-profit, cooperative employment agencies wherever possible.

Laird Describes Goals Of New Viet Nam Policy

Atlantic City—Describing the Administration's Vietnamization policy as a new approach, Defense Sec. Melvin Laird told the AFL-CIO convention that it "offers us the best prospect for bringing our men home quickly while achieving our objectives in Viet Nam."

"Vietnamization is something new," Laird said. "Those who view it as a mere continuation of the program for modernizing South Viet Nam's armed forces are quite mistaken.

"The Vietnamization program offers a major change not only in emphasis but also in objectives," Laird said in stating that in January the U.S. had no alternative plan to influence the course of events should the continuing efforts in Paris fail.

"Troop modernization until early this year had the negative goal of partially de-Americanizing the war. Vietnamization has a positive goal . . . of increasing Vietnamese responsibility for all aspects of the war and the handling of their own affairs," Laird said. "There is an enormous difference between these two policies."

Laird said the Administration's Vietnamization program has four high-priority actions under way: a stronger Viet Nam economy; stronger police for internal security; stronger government and stronger military forces.

He said the efforts to increase participation in the South Viet Nam government have resulted this year in self-government being brought to 700 villages and hamlets in recently pacified areas.

"There has been a notable increase in the number of citizens willing to seek local office and hence to face the threat of Viet Cong terrorism which has taken such a toll of local officials in past years," Laird said.

"I don't want to suggest for a moment that everything is going our way," Laird said, "for there are still serious problems before us.

"There are those who claim that the United States should establish a formal and fixed timetable for U.S. troop reductions in Viet Nam," Laird said. "We believe there are reasons why the unilateral setting of a fixed timetable would be unwise at this time.

"First, the readiness of South Vietnamese forces to supplant American forces may not coincide with a predetermined timetable. Second, any hope of progress in the Paris talks would evaporate.

"Third—and this is particularly important—we cannot at any stage of this process subject the American troops left in Viet Nam to danger of being overwhelmed by an enemy force," Laird said. "Any timetable set now could work out so as to leave a small band of Americans as a sacrifice to illusion, impatience or frustration."

Laird thanked the AFL-CIO for supporting "the efforts of our government to assure the right of self-determination for the people of Viet Nam" and said that to carry out his policy, Pres. Nixon needs the support of a united people.

$125 Minimum Won for 4,500 At Hospitals

New York—Workers at 23 private hospitals won a new three-year contract with a $125 weekly minimum wage after a six-hour strike at seven of the proprietary institutions.

The new pact affects 4,500 nurses' aides, orderlies, porters and kitchen workers. Besides raises totaling $42 a week, due by Dec. 1, 1971, members of Service Employes Local 144 will get their first family medical-surgical insurance plan, two additional paid holidays, and up to 15 days' paid sick leave with the unused portion to be paid shortly before Christmas or New Year's Day.

The same benefit pattern will be applied to Local 144 members at other New York City area hospitals.

"We did marvelously well," a union officer said. "We know that only 10 years ago these same workers were being paid only about $110 a month."

The contract provides a $15 weekly increase retroactive to Sept. 1; an additional $4 a week Dec. 1, followed by $10 next Sept. 1 and $13 on Dec. 1, 1971. It replaces the previous weekly minimum wage of $83 for 35 hours' work.

All the covered workers will get Jan. 15, the birthday anniversary of the late Rev. Martin Luther King, as a paid holiday, plus one additional day of their choice.

At the seven struck hospitals, the 1,500 strikers helped serve breakfast to patients at the start of the morning shift, then manned picket lines until the employers agreed to a settlement in talks at State Mediation Board offices.

Label Termed Major Asset To Unionism

Atlantic City—The union label—and its equivalents such as the shop card and service button—was hailed by the AFL-CIO convention as an important means of advancing labor's goal.

The convention urged affiliates to enter into union label agreements with employers and take part in the activities of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

Through this means, it said, the "mass purchasing power" of the millions of union members and their families can be used to encourage good working conditions and fair employers.

Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers, the chairman of the convention Union Label Committee, urged the delegates "to make this union label a crusade." He said "we hardly realize the potential . . . as a weapon for organized labor."

The convention asked affiliates to participate in the annual Union-Industries shows and formally designated Sept. 7-13, 1970, and Sept. 6-12, 1971, as Union Label Weeks.

In another resolution, delegates called on charitable and welfare groups soliciting support from unions and union members to make sure that their printed literature carries the Allied Printing Trades label.

AFL-CIO Gets Thanks from Hospital Unit

Atlantic City—Delegates to the AFL-CIO convention received the "heartfelt thanks and appreciation for the moral and financial support" given to the hospital workers during their strike in Charleston, S. C.

Mary Moultrie, president of local 1199B of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, described the strike as a fight in which "400 hospital workers—almost all of us women and all of us black—were compelled to go on strike so that we could win the right to be treated as human beings."

She thanked the "hundreds of our brothers and sisters from AFL-CIO unions who marched side by side with us and the AFL-CIO members in South Carolina who went to jail with us" in a fight to put an end to poverty wages of $1.30 an hour.

The strike was described as a fight against the managements of two hospitals and South Carolina officials such as Rep. Mendel Rivers and Sen. Strom Thurmond.

But it was also termed a fight against "the textile bosses, the men who really run our state, as well as all the other reactionary, racist forces which have kept South Carolina with the lowest literacy rate, the lowest per capita income and lowest percentage of unionized workers in the entire nation."

MARY MOULTRIE

MORE THAN 1,000 delegates and visitors were in the hall when AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany delivered his report to the eighth constitutional convention. Raised platform, center, holds newsreel and television cameramen and news photographers.

Labor Outlines Program to Make 'Model Employer' of Government

Atlantic City—A program to make the government a model employer, sponsored by 31 unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council, won the endorsement of the federation's convention here.

It leads off with a strong call for a union-management law for federal employes "as a matter of highest priority."

Such a law, the resolution said, should provide rights for workers similar to those in private industry.

It should provide binding arbitration of grievances and impasses in negotiations, the resolution said. It should set up a board for impartial administration of the law. It should enlarge the scope of bargaining and clarify the scope of so-called "management rights."

On pay, the convention resolution called on Congress to spell out the procedure for achieving the goal of "comparability" with private industry.

The resolution said the legislation should provide for union representation at all stages of the procedure. And it stressed that comparability of pay should be based on current private industry wage rates, and not on wage surveys a year old.

For blue collar federal workers, the resolution asked a revised Wage Board system "with equal union and management representation and with an impartial tie-breaking mechanism at all levels" so that hourly rates can be kept up to par with private industry.

No Postal Corporation

The proposal to turn over the mail to a postal corporation should be rejected, the convention said.

It warned that taking jurisdiction of the postal service away from Congress would deprive the American people of "an effective voice in the operation of this vital service."

As for assurances that unions of postal workers would have collective bargaining rights under the proposed corporation, the resolution said the restrictions placed on workers' rights would limit the effectiveness of the unions. And arbitration of negotiating disputes only when management agrees would make the process "totally ineffective," particularly if employes are forbidden to strike.

"Needed reforms and modernization of the postal system can be achieved within the framework of the existing departmental structure," the convention said.

Postal Clerks Pres. Francis S. Filbey told the delegates that postal workers "are now second-class citizens" but "if we become employes of this corporation, we will be tenth or eleventh-class citizens."

New Benefits Sought

Another section of the omnibus resolution called on the government to pay the full cost of health and life insurance benefits for its employes, with continuation of benefits after retirement.

The resolution noted that the "wasteful" practice of using military personnel to do work that can be performed by civilian employes "continues as a pressing problem."

Promotion policies, retirement, vacations, safety and travel pay issues were among the many areas covered by the resolution.

The convention called for a basic 35-hour workweek in the federal service without reduction in pay, and urged that the Hatch Act be revised to assure federal employes "maximum freedom to exercise their political rights and responsibilities as citizens."

A separate resolution expressed the appreciation of government workers for the support given by the AFL-CIO.

Unfair Charges Highest In History of NLRB

The National Labor Relations Board reported that an all-time record filing of unfair labor practice charges from April through June boosted the agency's total inflow of cases to a new high for any quarter-year period.

During the quarter, the NLRB received 3,276 unfair practice charges against employers — 143 more than a year earlier — and 1,892 against unions, up 280. The total was 423 higher than the 4,745 filed in the same period of 1968 and the highest ever for a three-month period in the 34-year history of the NLRB.

Total cases of all kinds for the April-June quarter were 8,693 this year, compared with 8,068 a year earlier.

The ratio of unfair practice charges filed was 63 percent against employers, 37 percent against unions, a division that has persisted for several years.

The report emphasized testimony by labor witnesses before a Senate subcommittee that the NLRB needs help in meeting its "almost crushing" load of cases.

Earlier General Counsel Arnold Ordman revealed that threatened budget cuts, a moratorium on new hires and loss of staff members to less burdened agencies threaten longer delays in already long-drawn-out NLRB procedures.

For the quarter ended June 30, NLRB was asked to conduct 3,525 secret-ballot representation elections and other types of employe voting.

After board regional offices investigated the merits of unfair practice charges, the general counsel issued 579 formal complaints and sent the cases to trial. A year before the three-month figure was 472.

During the period, trial examiners conducted 267 hearings on complaint cases. The five-member board issued formal decisions in 344 unfair practice cases after reviewing the facts.

Board agents conducted 2,236 representation elections in which 88 percent of eligible employes voted.

In 55 percent of the elections, employes chose a union to represent them. AFL-CIO unions won majority designation in 670 elections of the 1,341 in which they were on the ballot.

The board reported that 44 petitions for injunctions were filed at an employer's request against unions, and two against employers by the board under the labor law's provisions.

These cases were pending at the end of June 1969:

At the board level, 527, compared with 664 as of Apr. 1, 1969, and 469 as of June 30, 1968. Cases pending at the end of June 1969 were 356 involving unfair practice charges and 171 election requests.

Awaiting disposition were 9,992 cases. The comparable figures were 10,344 at the end of the previous quarter and 10,286 at the close of the April-June 1968 quarter.

Atlantic City — The AFL-CIO will continue to support the Kingsport Press boycott, the convention declared as it called on affiliates to renew their efforts to rid school systems of books produced by strikebreakers at the Kingsport, Tenn., plant.

In voting continued support of the boycott endorsed by the 1965 and 1967 conventions, the resolution also asked that "all possible publicity be given to the fact that World Book Encyclopedia and the Childcraft series are being printed and bound by strikebreakers.

The strike against Kingsport Press began in 1963 and involved over 1,000 members of five AFL-CIO unions.

Convention Urges Action:

Consumers' Needs Termed 'Pressing'

By John R. Oravec

Atlantic City—Increased consumer protection is a pressing national need despite the great strides made in this area in recent years, the AFL-CIO declared.

The federation called for controls on high interest rates, on credit charges, medical costs and the pricing of drugs. It urged Congress to act quickly "to remedy shocking inadequacies in consumer protection programs administered by the Food & Drug Administration."

Up to 10 million Americans each year become ill from eating contaminated food and countless others are affected by mislabeled or defective drugs, a convention resolution noted.

Full funding, adequate staffing and enforcement of existing consumer protection laws are especially essential to both the health and financial welfare of the people, the convention stressed.

Noting that the American worker and consumer must pay an annual interest rate of at least 18 percent on credit charge accounts in every state but Washington, the AFL-CIO called for a national campaign among state central bodies to lower this rate to no more than 12 percent a year.

The current exorbitant interest rates on charge accounts border on usury and eat away at the hard-won economic gains achieved at the bargaining table, a resolution stressed. Such high interest rates cannot be justified on the basis of financial need of the lenders.

Congress was urged to enact current proposals that would curb the excessive cost of consumer credit insurance, regulate credit reporting agencies and cure the abuses of unsolicited credit card mailings. Federal legislation to curb or abolish wage garnishment was also asked.

The Uniform Consumer Credit Code, now being considered by a number of state legislatures, has some good features, the convention said, but it warned that the drawbacks include outrageously high finance charges for consumers.

Noting that it could take several years for the states to enact a satisfactory form of the credit code, the federation suggested that Congress undertake the reforms in a federal law.

Much improved consumer product information services by the federal government are needed, the convention stressed, and these should include grading and standards programs. It noted that Americans spend $37 billion a year on cosmetics that have little or no federal regulation. And each year 18,000 people die and another 20 million are injured by hazardous products, including pesticides, flammable fabrics, electrical appliances and other dangerous articles.

Meaningless guarantees and warrantees, especially those affecting automobile buyers need correction, the resolution urged. It also cited the faults in auto and casualty insurance with exorbitant premiums.

The convention called for a stronger voice in consumer affairs in the federal government with the formation of high-level department or agency "to serve as the consumer's advocate in all public policy matters."

To curb runaway medical costs, the federation proposed fuller use of fixed monthly payment plans to replace the fee-for-service system.

The capitation system of monthly payments not only budgets the cost of health care for consumer, but also provides a budget within which the hospital or physician must operate, the resolution noted.

The federation also called for more effective use of medical manpower programs, improvements in the administration of hospitals, formation of hospital panels to review the practices of physicians and the establishment of a single financing system for in-patient and out-patient health services.

Concerned with the high profits being reaped by drug manufacturers and the health problems caused by mistakes in prescribing medicines, the convention urged the Administration and Congress to take steps to remedy the situation.

It called on the government to implement the recommendations of the Task Force on Prescription Drugs and for increased authority for the Food & Drug Administration—with power not only to evaluate the effectiveness of drugs but also to determine which drug is most effective for a particular disease.

Nebraska Labor Plans Suit to Test 'Work' Law

Omaha—Delegates to the 14th convention of the Nebraska AFL-CIO authorized state central body officers to file a lawsuit to void agency shop provisions of the Nebraska "right-to-work" law if attorneys advise such a step.

The convention and its 330 delegates—the largest turnout on record—also authorized a 4-cent raise in per capita to pay the costs of the suit if one is filed. That would require each affiliated union to pay 21 cents a month per member.

The state legislature added the agency shop to the prohibitions of the "right-to-work" law forbidding employers and unions to negotiate a union shop or some form of it. Union officers believe the legislature acted illegally and unconstitutionally in so doing.

In another action the delegates approved a closer working relationship between farmers and labor. Convention speakers included Pres. Elton Berck of the Nebraska Farmers Union, Pres. William Sellhorst of the National Farmers Organization and Lt. Gov. John Everroad.

Elected without opposition for their first four-year term were Pres. Richard W. Nisley, of the Cement Masons, and Sec.-Treas. Nels Petersen of the Meat Cutters. Twelve other members of the executive board were sworn in, also for four years. They are:

James Selko, Communications Workers; Dale McCoy, United Transportation Union; Don Elrod, Typographical Union; Don Bastemeyer, Carpenters; Paul Shaffer, Plumbers & Pipefitters; Sam Scarpello, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Willard Bauer and Bruce Peters, Meat Cutters; Bob Wallen, Rubber Workers; Harold Simpson, Grain Millers; Robert Danze, Asbestos Workers, and Rudy Chleborad, Brewery Workers.

To End Old-Age Poverty:

'Bold' Gains Pushed For Social Security

Atlantic City—The AFL-CIO served notice that it will press in Congress for a "bold program" of social security improvements to eliminate poverty among the nation's elderly.

Labor also will seek enactment of a federal welfare system as the ultimate answer to removing injustices and inequities in assisting the nation's poor, the federation's convention declared.

The shortcomings and inequities in social security and public welfare, along with recommendations for overcoming them, were the subject of resolutions adopted by the convention.

The convention reiterated labor's call for a 50 percent increase in social security benefits, with a provision for automatically adjusting them in the future in accord with a suitable measure of increase in wages.

The resolution on social security urged that the minimum benefit be raised from its present level of $55 a month to $100, and that a widow's benefit be equal to that for which her husband would have been eligible.

The program also called for:

- A flexible zone of retirement from 60 to 65 and provision for "less than a full actuarial reduction" in benefits for those who retire early.
- A raise in the contribution base (earnings on which social security taxes are paid) and provision for automatic adjustments in the future based on workers' wage gains.
- Extension of Medicare to include the disabled immediately and, "as soon as possible, all social security beneficiaries."
- Combining Medicare's hospital care and voluntary medical insurance programs to permit "the entire financing of medical care before retirement and remove the burden of premium payments after retirement."
- Reduction of the waiting period for disability benefits from six months to one, improvement in the method of computing the worker's average wage for benefit purposes, financing of future improvements out of general revenues as well as the payroll tax paid by workers and employers.

The convention emphasized that legislation to set up a federal welfare system must provide adequate financing of welfare costs, federal standards for eligibility and national minimum standards for assistance payments.

Until such a system can be adopted, a resolution said, Congress should require states to meet the level of assistance they have established as essential for minimum needs.

"The administration of public assistance must be humanized by the immediate adoption of a simplified method of determining eligibility," the resolution added.

Congress was urged to make it mandatory that all states provide assistance to needy families with an unemployed parent.

The AFL-CIO also asked that mothers of pre-school children be exempted from any work-training program as a condition for receiving welfare, and mothers with children in school only be required to take training during school hours.

The "first and most obvious" reason for having a federal welfare program, the resolution said, is an obligation to provide uniform assistance "in an amount which will lift people out of poverty."

It noted that the present national average welfare payment is less than $10 a week—ranging from $2.20 in Mississippi to $14.50 in New York. This, the convention observed, "is clearly not an incentive for idleness."

The convention reiterated AFL-CIO support for work-training for people receiving public assistance, provided they are able to participate in the training and programs "are not tinged with compulsion and distrust."

Current training programs for welfare recipients are "both defective and inadequate," the resolution said. It also deplored the lack of day-care facilities for children of mothers who want to take training.

Another resolution appealed to unions and central labor bodies "to undertake and support" programs to prevent retirement years from being "bitter and meaningless" for workers.

The resolution suggested such projects as retired union-member clubs; pre-retirement planning courses; "retiree centers" to provide education, recreation and social relationships; and programs to encourage retired workers to participate in community affairs and political education work.

Union Mortgage Aid Spurs Housing, Jobs

Atlantic City—Fuller participation in the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust was urged by convention delegates as a means of channeling more funds to meet the national housing construction goals.

The convention called on all affiliates, local unions, central bodies and trustees of pension funds to invest a portion of their total assets in the trust on a continuing basis.

Low- and moderate-income families are particularly affected by the housing shortage, a convention resolution noted.

One of the principal causes for the failure to meet the housing goals is the scarcity of money for residential financing, the resolution noted. Through the use of investments in the mortgage trust, the federation seeks to direct more funds into the home construction program.

Earlier, the Executive Council reported that the return on mortgage loans through the investment trust is yielding about 7 percent. The federation's investment program deals with mortgages fully guaranteed by the federal government.

Not only does the investment program make funds available for the housing market, but it also creates more jobs for union workers, the resolution stressed.

80 Countries Represented At Convention

Atlantic City—More than 270 foreign trade union representatives and visitors from 80 countries throughout the free world were guests at the AFL-CIO convention.

Many were introduced by name by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and convention speakers noted their presence with special greetings and messages.

The entire class at the American Institute for Free Labor Development's training program in Front Royal, Va.—37 representatives of Latin American unions—was on hand for opening day sessions.

Also attending the convention on another day were Latin American union leaders taking AIFLD's economics course at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C.

Spreading Benefits

In introducing AIFLD's students, Meany noted that when they complete their courses they return to their home countries to instruct at seminars. Thus, he said, "we are bringing the idea of free trade unionism to tens of thousands of Latin American workers."

In his introduction of visitors, Meany paid tribute to Tom Mboya, a leader in the Kenya government and a founder of Kenya's labor movement, who was assassinated in July.

"We deeply regret his death; it was a great loss to the Kenya federation and to the people of his country," Meany said.

National Health Insurance System Called 'Only Way' to Adequate Care

Atlantic City—The AFL-CIO has reemphasized the need for a National Health Insurance System "as the only way of assuring quality health care for all people."

Convention resolutions also voiced the AFL-CIO's determination to achieve new federal health legislation, negotiated health programs, prepaid group practice plans and better mental health care.

In reaffirming the 1967 convention's call for a national health program, the convention said it should "cover all of the people in the nation and be financed from the federal treasury."

The system, it was emphasized, should be comprehensive; include both curative and preventive treatment; cover all services by doctors, dentists and nurses; provide diagnostic services; and include prescription drugs, dentures, eyeglasses and prosthetic appliances.

Practitioners under the system should be well-rewarded for their services, but there should be "stringent controls" against fraud and overcharging with civil and criminal penalties for violators, the resolution said.

Until the nation has such a system, the AFL-CIO said, "we urge Congress to restore Medicaid's original objective of providing comprehensive services for all needy and medically needy people."

As of now, a resolution stressed, financing provisions of the federal-state Medicaid program are "inadequate" to accomplish the objective of providing health care to persons who cannot afford it.

The AFL-CIO charged Congress with failing to provide sufficient federal participation, setting "unrealistically low" income limits and restricting the scope of services required for the needy.

The resolution conceded that Medicaid costs have "demonstrated the runaway cost of health care" but it scored lawmakers for responding to higher costs by applying further limits to the program this year.

"The answer to uncontrolled costs is not to designate large groups of people to whom health care should not be available, but to establish methods of reasonable and effective cost controls," the resolution emphasized.

Another resolution pledged "vigorous support" for federal, state and local legislation to provide adequate funds for community health centers and programs to make "mental health services more widely available and accessible to all people."

All affiliates and central bodies were called on to work for federal financing for alcohol and drug abuse programs as part of community mental health services.

In the area of health legislation, the AFL-CIO prodded Congress to enact legislation sponsored by Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.) to strengthen and expand the Hill-Burton Hospital Construction Act.

The Administration was urged to propose legislation to provide money for planning, development, staffing and capital financing of comprehensive prepaid group practice plans.

The AFL-CIO also asked both the Administration and Congress to take steps to "curtail the escalation in health-care costs."

State and local central bodies were urged by the convention to organize "health committees" to study alternatives to the fee-for-service health delivery systems.

They were especially urged "to explore in cooperation with other community groups, the possibility of organizing prepaid group practice health plans."

A resolution on collective bargaining and health said negotiated plans should whenever possible permit covered employes to choose a group practice plan, Blue Cross-Blue Shield or commercial insurance coverage.

2 California Plants Pick Rubber Workers

Garden Grove, Calif.—The Rubber Workers won a long-sought victory when Randolph Rubber Co. employes voted 266 to 185 for the URW in a National Labor Relations Board election.

In another election, the URW was chosen in a 30-7 vote at Healthways, a subsidiary of Eldon Industries, toy makers.

Performing Arts Ask Union Check

Atlantic City—The eighth AFL-CIO convention called on union members to patronize only those theaters and other entertainment centers that have collective bargaining agreements with unions of performers, craftsmen and technicians in the art field.

The resolution asserted that the success of unions in winning higher wages and more leisure time for their members enables them to participate more fully in the cultural activities of their communities and to enjoy the work of singers, musicians, actors and other performing artists.

It stressed that the cooperation of the AFL-CIO and its affiliates could help unions in the performing arts maintain standards of fair pay and decent working conditions.

Senate Urged to Act On Direct Election

Atlantic City—Labor reaffirmed its support of a constitutional amendment for direct election of the President and Vice President of the United States.

The proposed amendment has passed the House and the AFL-CIO convention called on the Senate to approve it so that the States can act to ratify it before the 1972 presidential election.

"The electoral college system has outlived its usefulness," the convention said, "and should be abolished."

It termed the direct election amendment the only proposal for electoral reform "which will make sure that the candidates who receive the most popular votes will be elected."

5% Rate on Savings Bonds Held Vital to Program

Atlantic City—Workers must be assured a fair return on their investments in the U.S. Savings Bonds program, the AFL-CIO declared in calling for an increase to 5 percent on the government issues.

Congress was urged to quickly adopt a House bill to lift the "discriminatorily low" interest rate of 4.25 percent on the bonds to 5 percent by reducing the maturity of government issues. This should be done without raising or eliminating the statutory ceiling on long-term government securities, the federation added.

Some groups are seeking to use the obvious need to raise the interest rate on the bonds as a way of eliminating or lifting the ceiling on long-term government bonds, the resolution noted.

The federation said the savings bonds program must be salvaged because it benefits the worker as a savings device and provides the government with sorely needed funds for public investment and national defense.

The AFL-CIO pledged to continue promoting the savings bonds program under payroll deductions "if we can assure workers that their patriotic purchase of these bonds will assure them a fair return on their investment."

Oregon Labor to Seek Lower Interest Ceiling

Portland, Ore.—The Oregon AFL-CIO will seek voter approval in 1970 of a 12 percent ceiling on consumer installment purchases.

Delegates to the state labor federation's convention here last week authorized a campaign to gather the 41,000 signatures needed to put the interest limitation initiative on the ballot and to work for its enactment at the polls.

It was one of a series of consumer protection resolutions approved by the 563 delegates to the 117,000-member federation's 14th annual convention. Others call for review of auto insurance industry practices and for licensing legislation to protect the public against fly- by-night contractors and back-alley car repair shops.

Delegates overwhelmingly okayed a six-cent increase in the organization's monthly per capita tax which is now 15 cents. The 21-cent rate will go into effect next Jan. 1. State AFL-CIO Pres. Edward J. Whelan and Administrative Secretary-Treas. Glenn E. Randall had told the delegates a per capita increase was necessary if the state body is to be more than "a paper organization." The 1968 convention had rejected an increase, resulting in cutbacks in staff and services.

Whelan and Randall were reelected without opposition along with Earl B. Kirkland and Nellie M. Fox, first and second vice presidents.

Lloyd B. Knudsen, a business agent for Electrical Workers Local 48 in Portland, was elected in a five-man race to succeed George Brown as executive director of the legislative and political education department. Brown, who has reached mandatory retirement age, has held the office since the 1956 merger. Knudsen will succeed him on Dec. 1.

Delegates raised the salary of the President to $400 a week from $300 and upped the other two full-time officers to $325 from $250.

Former U.S. Sen. Wayne Morse was urged to run against Republican Congressman John Dellenback in Oregon's southern district next year.

The convention supported a series of tax reform proposals to close federal and state loopholes, increase the personal deduction to $1,200 and permit deductions for funeral expenses.

A 1970 ballot measure to enfranchise 19-year-olds was endorsed as was a ballot measure authorizing the state to issue pollution control bonds.

Resolutions were adopted against confirmation of Supreme Court nominee Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., and Federal Communications Commission nominee Dean Burch; Pres. Nixon's construction cutbacks; abuses by the health industry of Medicare, and the postal corporation proposal.

Delegates took positions in favor of annual sessions of the state legislature, abolishing Oregon's state-owned liquor stores in favor of a private enterprise system, higher benefits for injured and unemployed workers, a $2 an hour minimum wage, federal labor law protection for farm workers, a consumer boycott of Safeway stores for stocking struck California table grapes, better pay for postal workers and other public employes, improved social security benefits, and further development of community colleges.

The convention also adopted resolutions on behalf of senior citizens, railroad workers, the maritime industry and merchant marine.

Speakers included Gov. Tom McCall, Rep. Wendell Wyatt, State Labor Commissioner Norman Nilsen and AFL-CIO leaders from Idaho and Washington.

Longshoremen Act Weakening Fought

Atlantic City—A proposal to abolish the right of longshoremen injured on the job to seek damages from third parties, shipowners and vessels was strongly opposed by the AFL-CIO.

A convention resolution said the real benefit from such legislation would accrue to foreign flag operators since only 7 percent of American commerce is handled by American flag ships.

The resolution also endorsed pending legislation to liberalize the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers Compensation Act to increase the amount payable to a "realistic" level.

The convention noted that the law, enacted in 1927, makes compensation by the employer the exclusive remedy for on-the-job injury of longshoremen. But it preserves the right to seek damages against the shipowner and the ship. If damages are won, the employer must be reimbursed for any compensation paid.

Cheap Imports Cited:

Trade Policy Seeks Curbs On Loss of American Jobs

Atlantic City—Sweeping new trade programs and policies were proposed by the AFL-CIO convention to halt the rising tide of cheap-labor imports that are wiping out U.S. workers' jobs.

A wide-ranging resolution warned that labor's support for "orderly" trade expansion "does not include the promotion of private greed at public expense or the undercutting of U.S. wages and labor standards."

It urged the adoption of "a battery of realistic trade policies and measures to meet the needs of over 200 million people in a diverse national economy."

A companion resolution appealed for action by Congress to curb the outflow of American capital and "the export of American jobs."

Speaker after speaker arose on the convention floor to support the resolutions and describe job-erosion in a variety of industries resulting from soaring imports.

The main resolution—on international trade—stressed that labor's stand for expanded trade is hinged on the proposition that it will mean increased employment as well as improved wages and working conditions everywhere.

It noted that the 1967 AFL-CIO convention proposed revision of U.S. trade policies in the light of major changes in international investment, production, economic aid and trade.

But, it pointed out, the changes were not made and now "the continuing deterioration of the U.S. position in world trade requires new national policies."

U.S. exports of manufactured goods in the world market dropped from 27.7 percent to 23 percent between 1958 and 1968, the resolution said, adding: "The result has been a narrowing surplus of exports over imports—down to $800 million in 1968—with no improvement in sight."

Even worse than the threat to the U.S. balance of trade, the resolution suggested, are the ballooning investments of U.S. firms in foreign operations.

This transfer of operations to foreign plants "that pay workers as little as 15 cents an hour" leads to the destruction of American jobs and the displacement of U.S.-produced goods in world markets, the convention declared.

The resolution asked the government to enforce laws that apply to unfair competition from abroad, such as anti-dumping measures. "The United States should pursue concern for domestic interests, as foreign countries do for their national interests," it said.

One section of the resolution urged revision of the 1962 Trade Expansion Act "to clearly state the objective of protection of jobs and standards," along with changes in the law to help promote the export of U.S.-made products.

Another section urged renewal of the International Cotton Textile Agreements and the negotiation of similar agreements to regulate trade in textiles, apparels and other industries "sensitive to rapidly rising imports and unfair competition."

The resolution proposed that the United States seek to develop international fair labor standards in international trade through negotiations and aid developing nations toward improved trade and economic development.

In other areas, it called for adequate labeling of foreign products and foreign-made components, action to increase the carriage of U.S. products in U.S. vessels and safeguards against unfair tariff-cutting.

The resolution on "the export of American jobs" demanded new checks on the "skyrocketing rise" of foreign investments.

It pointed out that private capital outlays for plants and machines in foreign nations jumped from $3.8 billion in 1960 to $8.7 billion in 1968—totals which include outflows from the United States as well as plowed-back profits and funds raised abroad.

Outflows from the United States for investment overseas rose from $621 million in 1950 to $3.6 billion in 1966—"a major cause of the balance of payments problem," the AFL-CIO said.

"Entire plants and branches of industries are being shut down or cut back, so that U.S.-based international conglomerates can make financial gains" without regard for the damage they are doing to the U.S. economy, it was emphasized.

The resolution asked Congress to investigate foreign operations of U.S. firms to determine their impact on American production, employment and living standards, and it urged legislation "to supervise the operations of U.S.-based international companies."

It further asked Congress to seek ways to bar the use of foreign investment and trade policies for strikebreaking. It urged the closing of loopholes in the U.S. Tariff Code that encourage the export of jobs, and appealed for enforcement of U.S. antitrust laws "as they apply to imports."

These are some of the highlights from the extensive floor discussion.

Pres. George Baldanzi, United Textile Workers—Textile imports are destroying jobs of thousands of textile workers, "including many held by women who support families."

Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, Clothing Workers—"Our union abolished sweat shops and child labor. . . . We are not going to sit idly by to see our union liquidated by imports."

Pres. George O. Fecteau, Shoe Workers—"We are plagued with imports of those shoes from Japan and Italy. In Japan shoe industry wages are 40 cents an hour; in Italy the average wage is approximately 8 cents an hour."

Pres. Paul Jennings, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers—American companies "more and more are exporting" jobs in the electronics industry. Their products come back to America "at no reduction in price for the American consumer."

Pres. William Pollock, Textile Workers Union of America—"Our unions are not isolationist. We don't believe in barring all imports but we think there should be some protection against market disruptions that throw American workers out on the street."

Standards Undermined

Pres. Louis Stulberg, Ladies Garment Workers—"We have established standards that are considered adequate. They are being undermined by imports and we will have to do something about it."

Vice Pres. Benjamin Feldman, Leather Goods, Plastics & Novelty Workers—"I venture to say that 5 years from today you will have the shoe, handbag and other industries out in the street. None of these products will be made in America."

Pres. George M. Parker, Flint Glass Workers—"We have pleaded before every commission . . . for the handmade glass workers who are fighting for their livelihood" against the flood of cheaply made glassware imports.

Sec.-Treas. Fred Fulford, Furniture Workers—The American piano worker "is rapidly disappearing from the scene" due to the import of pianos made in Japan under low-wage conditions.

Abe Feinglass, Meat Cutters—A 269 percent increase in the imports of furs is "spreading unemployment through one of the oldest industries in America."

Border Exploitation Hurting Mexico, U.S.

Atlantic City—Congress was urged by the AFL-CIO convention to curb abuses by employers that are causing strains on international friendship along the Mexican border.

A resolution charged that U.S. firms are continuing to use Mexico's national frontier program (PRONAF) to "exploit workers" on both sides of the border. Manufacturers are exploiting the program which enables them to employ low-wage Mexican labor to assemble goods for shipment and sale to U.S. consumers at U.S. prices, the resolution noted.

It said labor laws of both countries are "evaded or violated" and manpower policies are abused by the use of federal funds that support exploitation of workers.

"Non-union plants, evasion of Mexican laws and cheap labor production for the high-priced U.S. market do not build friendship or economic development on the Mexican side of the border," the convention declared.

"False propaganda about jobs attracts more Mexicans northward which worsens unemployment and social conditions on both sides of the border.

"In addition, the effects of the program extend beyond the border areas, as some U.S. firms have used the basic principles of the border program in the heart of Mexico—the use of cheap labor exclusively for export to the high-priced U.S. market."

The program is "exporting" jobs from a U.S. area along the border where farm employment is declining, the jobless rate is running as high as 9 percent and "hundreds of thousands of American families have annual incomes of less than $2,000," the Federation said.

Some jobs exported to Mexico, the resolution added, affect employment in more distant parts of the United States "including communities that have an urgent need to maintain job opportunities for unskilled and semi-skilled workers."

The convention called for repeal of a section of the U.S. Tariff Code that provides special low tariffs on the goods assembled or partially produced in Mexico under the exploited labor.

Congress also was asked to probe the use of federal manpower training and anti-poverty funds in connection with the program and the operations of federal agencies in subsidizing or promoting it so as to undermine U.S. labor standards.

Total Support Stressed:

Cooperation Held Key to Organizing

Atlantic City—Cooperative organizing programs of the AFL-CIO are among the most effective and often necessary approaches to bringing collective bargaining benefits to all workers, the federation's eighth convention declared.

Today's organizing challenges need the total support of the labor movement, the delegates stressed in calling for a concerted effort to winning full union rights for the unorganized—the farm workers, the disadvantaged, the working poor, professional employes and workers in those sections of the country where stiff employer opposition to unionism prevails.

"Underlying every union program is the knowledge that success is related to strength and vigor of the labor movement," the convention declared in a resolution. "An indispensible ingredient of that strength . . . is the state of union growth."

Pres. George Meany told delegates that the AFL-CIO is well-equipped to give full assistance to affiliates in cooperative organizing drives, particularly with federation staff specialists, technical research, publicity and financial aid.

"What we need, of course," Meany added, "is that the organizations involved work with one another so we don't have any campaign with one organization bucking the rest."

He pointed out that the AFL-CIO organizing committee is continuing to encourage unions with overlapping jurisdictions to work together.

"We cannot organize," he warned, "if the unions in the same field are going to compete."

He emphasized the point that the AFL-CIO expects no affiliate "to go it alone in organizing."

The convention resolution spelled out the goals: Today, as in the earliest days of American trade unionism, the prime objective is still to organize the unorganized.

It noted that there is a growing awareness that organizing today requires skill and excellence second to no other phase of trade unionism.

The degree of organizing cooperation among AFL-CIO unions is probably at the highest level since the 1955 merger, the convention observed. These coordinated efforts are being conducted along both industry lines and on a geographical basis.

But while organizing emphasis and cooperation among unions have increased, there has been a regrettable rise in the intensity and scope of employer opposition, the resolution noted.

It said this mounting resistance is reflected in the proliferation of "labor consultants" by employers, in the heightened demands of professional labor foes for wholesale revision of national labor legislation, and in the sharp increase in unfair labor practices by employers during organizing campaigns.

The chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, the convention noted, recently reiterated a charge that some parts of the "American community and their lawyers" continue to battle against the national labor policy of promoting free collective bargaining and the exercise of organizing rights.

"Despite such oppostion, working men and women have continued to choose collective bargaining as the way to meet their problems on the job and elsewhere," the resolution stressed.

The resolution urged that all affiliates to continually analyze and reassess programs keyed to improving their own organizing efforts. It also called for the unions to commit the highest possible level of resources, including well-trained specialists to the organizing mission.

U.S. Contract Ban Urged For Union-Busters

Atlantic City—It is time for the federal government to stop rewarding employers who flagrantly violate the nation's labor laws, the AFL-CIO declared.

The federation urged Pres. Nixon to issue an executive order barring "flagrant labor law violators" from receiving government contracts.

The convention resolution cited the J. P. Stevens textile chain as a notorious offender which continues to receive government contracts despite a long record of illegal union-busting.

But the Stevens firm is not the only one, the resolution noted. "Thousands of workers in other industries have likewise been denied the right to organize by venal employers who boldly and flagrantly violate the National Labor Relations Act."

Firms that discriminate on racial grounds are properly denied government contracts by executive order and follow-up regulations, the convention noted.

It said the same principle should be applied to law-breaking firms that discriminate against union members.

Antitrust Escape For Dailies Fought

Atlantic City—Legislation before Congress that would exempt newspapers from antitrust laws should be defeated, the AFL-CIO convention said.

The goal of the legislation is to reverse the effect of a Supreme Court decision barring supposedly competing newspapers in the same city from profit-pooling joint publishing ventures.

Such combinations, the convention resolution noted, "have resulted largely in less diversity of news coverage and ideological viewpoint."

LABOR IN IRELAND has been calling for years for more democratic practices in Northern Ireland, and that call was not heeded, Gen. Sec. Rory Roberts of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions told convention. With Roberts, left, is Pres. Matthew Guinan of the Transport Workers. Delegates endorsed the sentiments of two resolutions calling for the elimination of discrimination in Northern Ireland in housing, employment and government.

Help Sought to Save U.S. Fishing Industry

Atlantic City—A fishermen's union official charged that "indifference and neglect" by both government and private interests have triggered the rapid decline of the U.S. fishing industry.

Stressing that U.S. fish consumption rose 23 percent last year, but more than 76 percent of the products consumed were imported, Steve Edney, head of the Cannery & Industrial Workers in Los Angeles, called for federal assistance for the sagging fishing industry.

"What would the average American think if we had to import 70 percent of our agricultural products?" he asked. "We would say this is a sad state of affairs . . . Yet, this is true in the fishing industry."

Edney said that Russian, Japanese and Polish fishermen, "apparently having fished out their own banks, are now moving in on ours," while U.S. fishing boats are "rotting at the dock" and many fishermen have been without work for months.

Edney, who is also a vice president of the Seafarers, appeared on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays, at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Sea Bottom Swept Clean

Edney called for better conservation agreements among nations. He said that foreign fishing fleets, not as closely restricted on gear and methods as U.S. fishermen, "sweep the bottom clean," catching many immature and unwanted fish. He said that such unrestricted fishing can "lead to the further decline" of this most important natural resource.

The union official said that few young people are interested in entering the fishing industry today. "When you have hard times in any industry," he noted, "people think twice before they invest their lives in it."

But, he added, federal assistance to fishing, as is done for agriculture, could "revitalize the industry so that people can make a living," and "many people will come back into it." Government subsidy would also help attract badly needed private capital into fishing, he added.

Questioning Edney on Labor News Conference, recorded at Atlantic City during the AFL-CIO convention, were Damon Stetson of the New York Times and Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press.

NEGLECTED BY BOTH government and private interests, America's fishing industry is skidding downward, Steve Edney, head of the Cannery & Industrial Workers in the Los Angeles area, warned on Labor News Conference. Edney, center, a vice president of the Seafarers, was questioned by Neil Gilbride, left, of the Associated Press and Damon Stetson of the New York Times on the AFL-CIO produced interview aired Tuesday at 7:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Irish Unions Praised for Easing Strife

Atlantic City—Irish trade unions have been successful in heading off an all-out conflict in Northern Ireland while continuing to campaign for social reforms, Sec.-Gen. Rory Roberts of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions told the AFL-CIO convention.

He said Irish labor for years has been urging the Northern Ireland government to end discrimination in housing and in local and parliamentary politics.

Although the demands for reforms went unheeded, the unions did not go out on strike when the social situation deteriorated, Roberts pointed out.

The Northern Ireland Committee of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions instead shifted some of its efforts to prevent the spread of disorders from the neighborhoods to the work places.

"In this effort I am proud to say success has been almost total," the Irish labor leader stressed.

Apart from a few isolated instances there has been no violence, no beatings, no killings in the plants that had earlier reflected the tensions in the neighborhoods, Roberts said.

He deplored the disorders that have destroyed so many homes in the major cities of the country and suggested that none of this was necessary had adequate reforms been enacted.

He noted that the Irish Congress of Trade Unions covers all 32 counties of both the Irish Republic and Northern Ireland, the only social organization that embraces both countries.

Earlier, the convention had endorsed the sentiments of two resolutions for the elimination of all discrimination in Northern Ireland.

The convention said its position "is in line with the traditional opposition of American labor to unjust treatment of any minority anywhere at any time."

Full Bargaining Rights Pressed on Public Jobs

Atlantic City—Legislation assuring "true collective bargaining rights" to state and local government employes was urged by the AFL-CIO.

A convention resolution declared that without effective bargaining rights, public employes "have no effective voice in the setting of the conditions under which they work."

The resolution called for repeal of "repressive laws" restricting the rights of state and local employes to organize and bargain collectively.

It urged that procedures similar to those in private industry be set up for the recognition of unions as exclusive bargaining agents and for the processing of unfair labor practice charges.

Public employe unions, the resolution added, should be enabled to negotiate effectively on "wages, hours and all conditions of employment, including union security."

The resolution noted that only a few states have adequate union recognition and bargaining laws for state and local workers. Some of these laws have incorporated techniques designed to help bring about a settlement such as "in-depth mediation and conciliation, fact-finding, and arbitration when mutually agreed upon by the parties."

But, the resolution added, a number of other states have resorted to "repressive legislation prohibiting or severely limiting employes of state and local governments from engaging in collective bargaining."

Some states, the convention noted, impose severe penalties on public employes who strike for legitimate goals.

"This type of repressive legislation has basically failed," the resolution noted. "It has not served as a deterrent to strikes by public employes, but rather has led to strikes and made them more difficult to resolve."

In separate resolutions, the convention urged that the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board be extended to two groups of presently excluded workers.

One group is made up of employes of colleges and universities. The convention urged the NLRB to assume jurisdiction over these institutions even if they are non-profit organizations.

The other group covers employes of non-profit hospitals and non-profit nursing homes. The hospital group is excluded by law and the convention resolution urged that the law be changed. The nursing home group is excluded by NLRB policy and the resolution urged the agency to cover these employes as it has employes of for-profit nursing homes.

INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS to control the flood of foreign goods threatening U.S. jobs was urged on Congress by Clothing Workers including Mrs. Esther Peterson, lower right. The union delegation headed by ACWA Vice Pres. Murray Finley presents a petition with 20,000 signatures to Chicago-area congressmen.

Federal Standards Held Vital to Jobless Benefits

The nation's unemployment insurance system needs to be improved now, and the only way to do it is through strong federal standards, the AFL-CIO testified.

Clinton M. Fair, an AFL-CIO legislative representative, urged the House Ways & Means Committee to take a much bigger step than the Administration has proposed to improve benefits and extend coverage.

Labor agrees with Pres. Nixon's statement that "it is essential that benefit maximums be raised," Fair told the committee.

The big difference in approach, he said, is how this can be done.

Pres. Nixon's request to the states to improve their maximum jobless benefits is "identical" to the request made by Pres. Eisenhower 15 years ago, Fair noted.

"The Administration and Congress can only expect bitter disappointment if they continue to wait upon the states to remedy the inadequate benefit structure of the program," he warned.

After 15 years, Fair reminded the committee, only two states—Connecticut and Hawaii—even come close to the Administration recommendations.

Fair urged a federal standard that would enable most workers to receive two-thirds of their lost pay during periods of unemployment, as contrasted to the 50 percent goal of the Administration. But he noted that under the present leave-it-to-the-states system, at the end of last year the maximum benefit was less than 50 percent of the average state wage in 34 states which had 84.1 percent of all workers covered by unemployment insurance.

He told the committee labor "certainly favors" extending coverage to the 5.3 million persons who would be brought under the jobless insurance system by the House bill.

But, he said, the AFL-CIO does not see any reason to continue to exempt millions of others from coverage. "We favor the extension of coverage to all wage and salary workers," he added.

The testimony, presented on behalf of AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, also detailed labor's position on a number of qualification standards proposed by the Administration.

Some, he said, would be backward steps, forcing some states to impose harsher disqualification rules.

Mortgage Rate Report Called 'No Solution'

Mortgage interests rates can and should be brought down, the AFL-CIO said in a statement to the Senate Banking Committee.

The statement by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller expressed labor's disappointment in the report of a Commission on Mortgage Interest Rates, set up last year with government and public members.

Its recommendation to abolish legal ceilings on FHA and VA mortgage interest rates, Biemiller said, "represents no solution at all—only surrender."

He suggested that the commission's report reflects in large part the makeup of the "public" members.

While the legislation mandates appointment of at least three public members to represent the consumer, four of the five persons named were officials of banking associations, the home builders association and a Wall Street brokerage firm.

"We feel this greater concern for merchandising of mortgages than the solving of housing needs is reflected in the commission's conclusions," he said.

The statement outlined the AFL-CIO's program to increase the supply of housing and bring down interest rates through a variety of measures, including direct government loans and utilization of $5 billion in the national service life insurance fund for veterans' mortgages.

Stronger Copyright Protection Backed

Atlantic City—Terming the nation's copyright laws shockingly lax, the AFL-CIO praised the 91st Congress for now considering the first revision in nearly 60 years.

The convention also praised the proposals of Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), that would assure the performing artist of compensation for the broadcast and commercial exploitation of his recorded work.

Republicans Join in Opposition:

the resolution suggested, "the full extent of interrelationship between Clement Haynsworth, businessman and investor, and Clement Haynsworth, supposedly impartial judge," may never be known.

He has admitted to involvements "only reluctantly, and only after they have been uncovered by others and spread on the record by others."

The convention asked that Haynsworth withdraw his name from consideration for the Supreme Court. If he does not, it urged Pres. Nixon to withdraw the nomination. And if that is not done, the AFL-CIO said, the Senate should reject the nomination.

The nomination moved a step closer to a showdown as the conservative-dominated Judiciary Committee voted 10-7 to recommend confirmation.

Ironically, one of the votes against the nomination was cast by the assistant Republican leader in the Senate, Robert P. Griffin (Mich.). Griffin had been persuaded to claim a vacancy on the Judiciary Committee last month by Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell. This prevented Sen. Charles E. Goodell (R-N.Y.), who had indicated opposition to the Haynsworth appointment, from moving on to the committee.

Griffin, who had led a filibuster to block confirmation of Abe Fortas as Chief Justice, indicated when he went on the committee that he would probably vote for confirmation of Haynsworth. But on the eve of the committee vote, he said "legitimate and substantial doubt has been raised" as to Haynsworth's "sensitivity to the high ethical standards demanded by the bench."

At the same time, Sen. Margaret Chase Smith (R-Me.) disclosed that she had written Pres. Nixon urging him to withdraw the nomination.

Mrs. Smith, who is chairman of the Senate Republican Conference, told the President that confirmation of Haynsworth would "further damage the public confidence in the court."

And she wrote the President what polls from various sources have established—that "there is much more opposition to the Haynsworth nomination among Republican senators than is generally realized."

The stinging indictment by Sen. Bayh was must reading in congressional and White House offices within hours after it was issued.

Bayh termed it a "partial report" and said he and his staff have had "extreme difficulty" getting access to Justice Dept. material on cases in which Haynsworth was involved. The department, he charged, "appears to have embarked on a calculated effort to sanitize the records."

But even the partial listing uncovered four instances—in addition to one that came to light during the hearings—in which Haynsworth "had a substantial stock interest" in a company which was a party to a case before his court.

Yet, Bayh noted, Haynsworth last Sept. 6 wrote Judiciary Committee Chairman James O. Eastland (D-Miss.) that he had disqualified himself in all cases in which he had a stock interest.

As for Haynsworth's role in the Carolina Vend-A-Matic Co. which did a $100,000-a-year business with Deering Milliken textile mills, Bayh said corporation minutes disprove the judge's claim that he did not play an active role as a director and officer of the company.

The minutes showed that directors were active in locating new business, Bayh reported, and Haynsworth "took part in decisions to buy and sell land to himself and other directors and the profit-sharing trust." He endorsed notes for the corporation in amounts exceeding $500,000.

And, Bayh revealed, the Deering Milliken case in 1963 wasn't the first example of Haynsworth sitting in judgment on a firm with which Carolina Vend-A-Matic did business.

Bayh listed six other such cases between 1958 and 1963.

In all, Bayh listed eight "canons of ethics" of the American Bar Association that he said Haynsworth has violated.

The Indiana senator said he issued his documented attack on Haynsworth "with no malice" and with "considerable regret."

As the evidence mounted and the list of declared opponents grew, there were recurring reports that the President would withdraw the nomination.

They were repeatedly denied by the White House and newsmen were told that the President was sticking with the nomination.

A possible sign of a shift came in a comment from Sen. Ernest F. Hollings (D-S.C.), who with South Carolina's Republican senator, Strom Thurmond, is leading the fight for confirmation.

A week earlier, Hollings had described as "ridiculous" a report that Haynsworth would ask the President to withdraw the nomination.

Now, Hollings told newsmen, he would not rule out that possibility.

At that time, he said, he felt sure of 56 votes for confirmation. Now "circumstances have changed" and confirmation by even a single vote "would be quite a victory."

$600 Million for Pollution Control Triples Administration's Request

The House voted three times as much money as the Administration had requested to combat water pollution, and an atttempt to increase the amount even further fell only two votes short of passage.

The Administration had asked only $214 million in federal grants to help build sewage treatment facilities.

But the House voted $600 million for this fiscal year, plus an additional $65 million in carryover funds. A bipartisan group of congressmen made a strong bid to appropriate the full $1 billion that Congress had authorized for this year when it passed the 1966 Clean Water Act.

The motion to raise the money to $1 billion was rejected on a 148-146 non-rollcall vote after Interior Sec. Walter J. Hickel sent word that the government couldn't spend that amount of money this fiscal year if it had it.

Conservation groups and governors of most states, along with the AFL-CIO and other public interest organizations, had protested vigorously the shortchanging of pollution control in the Administration's budget.

As the protests mounted, first a House Appropriations subcommittee raised the budget figure to $450 million, and then the full Appropriations Committee increased it further to the $600 million figure. At the end, Administration supporters found themselves urging votes for the committee bill in order to stave off the $1 billion amendment.

In other major congressional action:

- The Senate passed a union-supported civil service retirement bill which raises benefits and strengthens the financing of the program. The House, which had passed a similar measure, accepted the Senate version intact and cleared it for the President's signature.

The bill raises the retirement pensions for federal employes by computing them on the basis of the "high three-year average salary" instead of the present highest five-year average. It also increases the cost-of-living escalator for pensioners, considers unused sick leave as service time at retirement, and improves survivor benefits.

Employes would pay 7 percent of their pay into the retirement fund, up from the present 6.5 percent, and the government would increase its contribution and pay an additional $200 million a year to restore the fund to actuarial balance. A motion by Sen. John J. Williams (R-Del.) to eliminate virtually all the benefit improvements from the bill was defeated, 56-8.

- A House-Senate conference committee broke a deadlock on a college student loan bill. It authorizes the government to pay up to a 3 percent "incentive fee" to banks which make government-guaranteed student loans at the legal ceiling of 7 percent. In effect, this raises the interest banks will receive to 10 percent. Most banks had refused to loan money at the 7 percent rate.
- The Senate voted unanimous approval of a strong bill requiring oil companies to pay for the clean-up cost for oil spills, such as the leakage that polluted the Santa Barbara channel in California. It also would require all ships and boats with toilets to meet anti-pollution standards and directs the Interior Dept. to set pesticide limits for waterways within two years. The House earlier passed a weaker bill and a conference committee will try to reach an agreement.

Changes Sought In Careers Plan

Atlantic City—The public service careers program proposed as an expanded phase of the government's manpower training program is well-intentioned but in need of some amendments, a convention resolution declared.

One of the changes suggested by the AFL-CIO would require approval of a union holding bargaining rights for the public agency, and that conditions of employment and training adhere to the union contract.

The resolution also called for broader sponsorship provisions, not restricted to government agencies.

Highest in 2 Years:

Jobless Rate Climbs To 4% in September

crease was "somewhat consistent with other evidence" that the economy is cooling off.

The next day, Treasury Sec. David M. Kennedy told the Joint Economic Committee of Congress that a 4 percent unempoyment rate was "acceptable" to the Administration.

Prodded as to what rate the Administration would find "unacceptable," Kennedy said, "I couldn't give you a figure." He declined to say whether a 7 percent rate would be "unacceptable." That was the rate in the 1960 recession.

The day after he testified, Kennedy issued a clarifying statement to make "crystal clear" the Administration's belief that "any unemployment in our country, however small is an unhappy condition."

In releasing the job figures, Harold Goldstein, deputy commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, cautioned about reading too much significance into a one-month change in the unemployment rate.

Steady Rise

What is important, he said, is the steady rise in the quarterly unempoyment rate—from 3.3 percent in the January-March period, to 3.5 percent in April-June and to 3.7 percent in the past three months.

The number of unemployed persons in September was about 3 million. After adjustment for seasonal changes, the total was up 365,000 over the month, with two-fifths of the increase among workers 20-24, mainly men.

Over the year, unemployment was up 350,000, reflecting a rise of 150,000 for adult women and 100,000 each for adult men and teenagers, BLS said.

Jobless rates climbed for most groups of workers over the month. The rate for adult men rose from 2.1 to 2.4 percent; the rate for adult women went from 3.8 to 4.2 percent; and the rate for white workers moved up from 3.2 to 3.6 percent.

The only rates significantly unchanged were those for teenagers (13.2 percent) and black workers (6.8 percent), according to the government.

The big leap was in the unemployment rate for blue-collar workers which went from 3.8 to 4.4 percent in September, reflecting increased unemployment in all three occupational groups — craftsmen, operatives and non-farm laborers.

In manufacturing, the jobless rate rose from 2.9 to 3.7 percent, while the rate for construction workers, at 7.6 percent, was virtually unchanged, BLS reported.

On the jobs side, non-farm payroll employment increased by about 300,000 over the August level to 70.8 million in September. But after seasonal adjustment, payroll employment was unchanged over the month.

Seasonally adjusted changes in payroll employment in individual industry categories were as follows:

Manufacturing, down 55,000 to 20.3 million; contract construction, down 10,000 to about 4 million; transportation and public utilities, unchanged at 4.4 million; wholesale and retail trade, down 7,000 to 14.6 million; finance, insurance and real estate, up about 7,000 to 3.6 million; services, up 60,000 to 11.1 million; government, unchanged at 12.1 million.

The civilian labor force in September stood at 81.4 million, about 300,000 above August. The increase was mostly among teenagers, contrary to a usual trend.

In another area, the Labor Dept. said that average hourly earnings for rank-and-file workers rose by 5 cents in September to $3.10. Average weekly earnings increased $1.29 to $117.80.

The seasonally adjusted average workweek edged up one-tenth of an hour to 40.7 hours. The figure, however, was three-tenths of an hour below last September. Factory overtime averaged 3.5 hours a week, down two-tenths of an hour.

Construction Unions Keep Disputes Plan

Atlantic City—Presidents of the national and international unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. have unanimously voted to continue seeking a "feasible and amicable method" of settling jurisdictional disputes in the building industry, Dept. Pres. C. J. Haggerty said.

They made the decision, he asserted, "notwithstanding the action of the Associated General Contractors of America, and possibly certain other trade associations, in refusing to agree to an extension of the National Joint Board agreement" which expired Sept. 30.

Haggerty accused the AGC of "high-handed arbitrary tactics" in refusing to move the expiration date past the period of the AFL-CIO convention and the department convention which the presidents have been attending.

The contractors' action may result, Haggerty pointed out, in unstabilization of the construction industry "with consequences detrimental to the interests of employers" as well as unions.

He said the Joint Board "has rendered quick, effective and inexpensive service in the settlement of jurisdictional disputes and work stoppages for more than 20 years." He predicted that the AGC's effort to transfer the resolving of such disputes to the National Labor Relations Board will result in "delays and heavy legal costs."

'Give Up?'

Meany Asks Van Arsdale To Seek Opera Accord

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has asked Pres. Harry Van Arsdale of the New York City Central Labor Council to represent him in seeking a solution to a contract stalemate between the Metropolitan Opera Co. and the unions of its musical artists and other employes.

Meany requested Van Arsdale to explore the issues in dispute and to seek a satisfactory resolution in cooperation with the presidents of the various unions involved.

"I have discussed this approach with these officers and am assured of their cooperation," Meany said in a letter to Van Arsdale.

Recent conversations with these officials led Meany to conclude that a "proffer of the good offices of the federation is warranted and might be helpful in encouraging more constructive negotiations," he wrote.

Although the Metropolitan Opera is a local entity, it "plays an important role in the cultural life of America" and the world of music, Meany observed. He said the union movement "has the same stake as the public at large in its survival."

"We . . . must insist that the talents, skills and vital contributions" of opera employes be fully recognized and rewarded, he said. "We ought also to do what we can to assure that a genuine constructive effort is made to find a fair resolution of any issues" barring a settlement, Meany said.

When negotiations deadlocked, the Met locked out the Musical Artists on the day the opera was scheduled to open its new season, the unions said. Besides, the Met has held little discussion with other unions involved, including the Musicians, Theatrical Stage Employes and the Service Employes, they said.

Rail Emergency Board Sets Shopcraft Hearing

A special Emergency Board named by Pres. Nixon to block a strike of four shopcraft unions against six U.S. railroads scheduled its first formal hearing for Oct. 11.

Machinists Vice Pres. William W. Winpisinger, spokesman for his union and the Boilermakers, Sheet Metal Workers and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, said they hope the board's recommendations will "provide a basis for equitable settlement" of contract issues. The unions represent 45,000 workers in shops of the six railroads—the Santa Fe, Great Northern, Erie-Lackawanna, Illinois Central, Southern, Chesapeake & Ohio-Baltimore & Ohio.

The unions have tried for nearly a year to get a 10 percent increase in basic wages, plus 20 cents an hour for skilled workers. This they said, would bring wages closer to those in off-railroad jobs. The companies offered a 2 percent raise retroactive to Jan. 1, then 3 percent more from July 1. When the unions set an Oct. 4 strike deadline, management appealed to Nixon after threatening to shut down all railroad service nation-wide, except on the Penn-Central, which withdrew from the group.

Winpisinger said the shopmen are "determined to win justice through their right to bargain collectively." The railroads, he said, will "have to meet modern American wage scales."

Two other shopcraft unions are negotiating separately, the Firemen & Oilers and the Railway Carmen.

In other developments on the railroads:

- The United Transportation Union asked the carriers for contract improvements including two 15 percent wage boosts over a two-year period, plus a cost-of-living escalator clause for its 280,000 members.
- Wage increases ranging from 30 to 54 percent over three years were asked of all employers by the Railroad Signalmen.

House Panel Rejects Postal Corporation

A labor-opposed bill to turn the postal service over to a public corporation was rejected on a tie vote by the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee.

The committee promptly turned to consideration of an alternative bill that would keep the Post Office as a government department, with wage rates set by Congress, but authorize the sale of bonds to raise money for needed modernization and capital improvements.

This alternative course, proposed by Committee Chairman Thaddeus J. Dulski (D-N.Y.), is the one that has been urged by AFL-CIO postal unions.

The AFL-CIO convention voted opposition to the postal corporation proposal, noting that it would deny postal workers the rights of employes in private industry, while barring their present recourse to Congress.

Earlier, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany had testified against the corporation plan, telling the House committee that labor believes the government must continue to "carry the mail."

The House committee split 13-13 on the issue, thus defeating the corporation bill. Eight Republicans and five Democrats favored the corporation plan; 10 Democrats and three Republicans opposed it.

Rep. Morris K. Udall (D-Ariz.), who sponsored the Administration's corporation bill, commented: "I suspect we'll have to drop the corporation idea and leave the Post Office Dept. within the Executive Branch."

IUE Negotiating Unit Turns Down GE Bid

New York—Union negotiators rejected a General Electric Co. wage offer as "totally unacceptable" and urged management to start bargaining in good faith for 90,000 of its employes represented by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers at 65 locations.

The offer, GE's first, was described by IUE Pres. Paul Jennings as "a horrible example of deceptive packaging" that would "force GE employes to pay the full cost of an inflation they did not create."

Management made its first offer after two months of negotiations. It was for a raise of 20 cents an hour this year, plus 5 to 25 cents additional for highly skilled workers, and two reopeners on wages in 1970 and 1971. IUE's vote to reject was supported not only by members of IUE locals but also by representatives of all the other unions that have contracts in GE plants.

The unions have established the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee at GE and Westinghouse to prevent the two powerful corporations from "whipsawing" one union against another. When negotiations opened in August, each union had representatives present as invited members of the IUE committee. This coordinated approach was challenged by management in the last round of negotiations and ruled lawful by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals here.

Jennings said the GE proposal constitutes "a scheme that gives with one hand and takes away with the other" and adds up to "one of the worst GE offers" in contract history.

Jennings reported that GE management, after hearing IUE evidence that rising prices have "eroded every penny of employe increases during the last nine years," and after admitting that "this ought to be a money year," proposed a "skimpy" raise of $8 a week in a three-year contract.

IUE Chief Negotiator John Shambo told management that average earnings at GE plants have risen 25 percent in nine years but as of August 1969, living costs had gone up 24.1 percent to wipe out all the wage gains.

At the same time, while real income did not increase, worker output has risen by 46 percent, and the company's net profit per employe rose 47.4 percent, he said.

Other AFL-CIO unions on the coordinated committee are the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Steelworkers, Carpenters, Technical Engineers, Plumbers, Flint Glass Workers, Machinists, Allied Industrial Workers and Sheet Metal Workers.

Legislatures Seen In Need of Reform

Atlantic City—Most state governments need overhauling and greater powers to carry out their functions, the AFL-CIO said.

The Federation urged its state central bodies to press for the establishment of broadly representative citizens commissions to develop proposals for legislative reform.

The resolution urged that:

- Legislatures meet every year and constitutional limitations on the length of sessions be removed.
- Office facilities be provided for members of legislatures along with pay that is "both commensurate and adequate on the basis of a fulltime job."
- Standing committees be staffed with competent people and votes both in committee and on the floor be made a matter of public record.

Labor Renews Crusade for Tax Justice

Bids Senate Improve House Reform Bill

Atlantic City—Labor's crusade for tax justice was renewed at the AFL-CIO convention in a major resolution calling for:

- "The complete removal of the impoverished from the nation's tax rolls.
- "A meaningful reduction in the relative tax burdens of low- and middle-income families.
- "The elimination of the loopholes of special tax privilege for wealthy families and businesses."

The convention termed the tax reform bill passed by the House "a major step down the road toward tax justice."

But it does not go far enough, the resolution noted, and the Nixon Administration's proposals to the Senate, if adopted, "would undo many of the forward measures proposed by the House and add additional inequities."

The convention urged the Senate to strengthen the House bill and reject all proposals that "would move the tax structure still farther away from America's standards of fair play."

It stressed the AFL-CIO's insistence that "all special tax privileges, and particularly those which discriminate between earned and unearned income, are completely unfair and must be eliminated."

Most of the tax loopholes have developed over the years through "horse-trading for special privilege," the resolution noted. And "additional tax loopholes for wealthy people and corporations are now being advocated as panaceas for virtually every national ill. . . . Those who make these proposals would further reward those who already more than adequately share in America's affluence."

Earlier, delegates heard AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany warn in his keynote address that Washington is "crowded with well-heeled lobbyists who represent every group that has a selfish interest in perpetuating the special tax preference that they now enjoy."

The convention resolution stressed that "federal tax policy has become an important tool for the advancement of the nation's economic and social goals."

The money the federal government raises in taxes is essential to provide public facilities and services for "a growing and increasingly urban population," and to combat poverty and help states and cities.

Union members, the convention declared, "are willing to pay their fair share of taxes."

The AFL-CIO reiterated, however, that fair taxation can come about only when all forms of income are taxed on the same basis. The present tax structure "is rigged against wages and salaries," it asserted.

The resolution denounced the "triple standard" by which income earned through work is taxed in full, but only half of the profit from stocks and other capital assets is taxed, and income from tax-free bonds, oil depletion allowance and bookkeeping farm losses "completely escapes taxation."

As for proposals to give corporations tax credits for socially useful programs, the convention warned that the federal government would then be surrendering budget control "to the wealthy investors and businesses who reap most of the benefits—without federal performance standards."

And the resolution stressed, "when a privileged few are provided shelters that enable them to avoid their fair tax share, others must reach deeper into their pockets."

In another area of tax policy, the AFL-CIO convention called for "unequivocal" rejection of all proposals for a federal sales tax.

"Whether such proposals are called 'value-added' taxes or offered clearly as a tax on consumers, the effect is the same," the resolution said. "Those who can afford it least bear the brunt of the burden."

There is need to ease the tax burden on families in the low- and middle-income brackets, the resolution continued, but there is no justification for "generous rate reductions for wealthy taxpayers recommended by the House and the Administration" nor for the cut in corporation taxes sought by the Administration.

The convention stressed labor's belief that the United States has the resources to overcome its problems and that a fair tax policy will enable the nation to finance the programs so urgently needed.

Astronaut Aldrin Thanks Workers, Says 'You Walked With Us' on Moon

Atlantic City—America's first union man on the moon thanked the nation's workers for their skills and tax dollars that helped him get there.

Col. Edwin E. Aldrin, Jr. appeared before the AFL-CIO convention to speak for himself and Neil Armstrong and Michael Collins, the astronauts who made the historic July journey with him.

Holding up an honorary Machinists card, Aldrin said, "I am glad that you have continued my membership, even though it has been a while since I had my time card stamped."

"However," he added, "I have managed to keep busy."

After the delegates watched a 20-minute film on the moon flight and the preparations that led up to it, Aldrin described visits the astronauts have made to plants involved in the space program.

The tours, he said, have given the astronauts an opportunity to see union men and women at work on the vital components of the machinery and vehicles "that carried us into space."

"The union label means quality," he added, "the assurance of the highest quality; and we know it."

"We want you to know how deeply grateful we are for your labor and the tax dollars that provided us with the complex machinery and equipment that guaranteed both the success and safety of our mission," Aldrin said.

"It was your mission and your triumph, too," he noted, "and assuredly you walked with us and left your foot-prints on the desolate lunar surface."

Aldrin estimated that more than 400,000 workers were involved in making the moon mission possible, encompassing a wide range of skills, services and trades.

He singled out these "very important people" as being members of unions affiliated with the Building & Construction Trades and Metal Trades departments, and such unions as:

Machinists; Communications Workers; Steelworkers; International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Transport Workers; Pattern Makers; Technical Engineers, and the Government Employes.

Aldrin told the delegates that space exploration has given man a better chance to view earth as "a store-house rich in as-yet-untapped resources" and a better understanding of how to improve life.

He described pictures from orbital flights that have enabled land resource experts to identify vast desert areas in India that were once fertile and could possibly be made to bloom again.

By the 1980s, Aldrin predicted, the United States will have a "space base" made up of individual space stations to perform "a broad range of physical and biological experiments."

"As you can see," he said, "man's first step on the moon—in truth—was only a beginning, a small step toward that great leap that can be made by all mankind."

Era of Peace Possible

He voiced hope that "a new era of peace and abundance" may result from space exploration and "man may learn to control and improve himself in the same spirit of fraternal cooperation such as that of an international brotherhood of workers."

Aldrin, who interrupted a world tour by the three astronauts to address the convention, expressed similar hopes at a press conference.

He said it was "inspiring" to meet people all around the globe and that it was bringing to him a real sense of the basic needs of man.

The moon flight, he said, proved what a nation can do "once it sets a goal" and now the same resolution must be given to resolving problems of poverty, illiteracy and pollution.

But, he added, "it may turn out to be easier to reach the moon than to solve some of the difficult problems here on earth."

Wider Labor Role in Communities Keyed to Meeting People's Needs

Atlantic City—Active labor participation in community affairs was cited by the convention as a force in helping to make communities "more representative of the people and more responsive to the people's needs."

To make this more effective, all AFL-CIO affiliates were urged to establish community services committees and to designate fulltime community services directors whenever possible.

Personal and family needs not met by union contracts must be met by extending services "beyond the plant gates and the collective bargaining agreement into the neighborhood and the community as a whole," the convention said. This goal could be furthered by serving on the policy-making boards of agencies, developing needed new services and by the "application of collective bargaining techniques to consumer-merchant, patient-physician and tenant-landlord relationships."

The recent cooperation of the Red Cross and the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services to aid communities stricken by Hurricane Camille was singled out as an outstanding example of the relationship between labor and social welfare agencies.

Emergency shelter, food, clothing, new homes and repairs, funds and volunteers were provided hurricane-ravaged communities in Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Virginia and West Virginia by community services programs in cooperation with the Red Cross.

A great volunteer building project continues in Plaquemines Parish, La., as developed by the Louisiana AFL-CIO, the Building & Construction Trades Council of that state and the Red Cross.

But it was noted that while such voluntary efforts were lauded, the convention declared that the government must assume "full responsibility" for meeting "the basic health, welfare and educational needs of the American people."

The Administration's current campaign to stimulate voluntary citizen action in American life, while "laudable," should not "divert the people from this hard truth," the convention said.

Voluntary agencies were urged to make clear to the Administration that "only major governmental action and substantial appropriations of government funds will basically solve many of the social and economic problems confronting our people."

35-Hour Week Reaffirmed as Key Objective

Atlantic City—Reduction of the workweek to 35 hours and double-time pay for overtime work continues as one of the major goals of the AFL-CIO.

A resolution adopted by the federation reaffirmed its support for reduced working-hours, longer vacations, sabbatical leaves and early retirement provisions.

Additional paid holidays and other provisions to increase leisure time are stressed to improve the quality of life of working men and women and create additional job opportunities.

The resolution noted that the prevailing overtime pay rate is no longer effective in curbing long overtime hours. With the growth of fringe benefits that are exempt from overtime requirements, the time and one-half premium is less a deterrent than when it was first established in 1938 under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the convention observed.

Haynsworth Opposition Builds Up

The White House sought desperately to shore up the crumbling support for confirmation of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., to the Supreme Court, but it was finding reinforcements hard to come by.

Every "hard count" of Senate opinion, including tallies by leading newspapers and wire services, continued to show declared opponents of the nomination substantially outnumbering supporters.

With pro and con committee reports still to be written, the nomination is not expected to reach the Senate floor until next month.

In the interim, observers generally agreed, the Administration will have to win over virtually all of the still "undecided" senators in order to stave off rejection. The votes it will need include those of a number of Republicans who have expressed the hope that Pres. Nixon will withdraw the nomination, but have not said flatly that they will vote against confirmation if he does not.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, interviewed by Martin Agronsky over the CBS television network, charged that the Justice Dept.'s role in the Haynsworth case has been "shameful."

The department's letters and statements to the Senate Judiciary Committee and individual senators have been those "of a lawyer advocating a case for a client," Meany said. By ignoring unfavorable material, "the Justice Dept. was not giving the Senate committee all the truth."

As the Supreme Court opened its fall term with the seat vacated by the resignation of Abe Fortas still unfilled, there were these developments:

- An American Bar Association Committee took a "second look" at the Haynsworth nomination, a move that had been eagerly awaited by the judge's supporters. The ABA committee, whose chairman is Pres. Nixon's personal representative to the Viet Nam peace talks, earlier had endorsed the nomination.

As far as having any political impact is concerned, the "second look" apparently backfired against Haynsworth.

In its first report, the committee gave unanimous backing to Haynsworth, but this time around, four of the 12 ABA committee members reportedly dissented from the endorsement. It was only the second time in its history that the committee has given less than a unanimous endorsement to a Supreme Court nominee.

- An attempt by Haynsworth supporters to demonstrate broad Senate support for the nomination found only a corporal's guard will-

Injuries Rise In Absence Of U.S. Law

Labor called on Congress to act quickly "to stop the killing in the workplace, the crippling injuries and the disease-induced illnesses that plague workers in the United States."

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller and Pres. I. W. Abel of the federation's Industrial Union Dept. called for passage of a strong occupational safety and health bill, based on legislation introduced by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.).

Biemiller told a House Labor subcommittee that more than 14,000 workers have died on the job since the AFL-CIO testified for similar legislation last year.

"Another 2.2 million have been injured," he said. "Billions of dollars in wages and production have been lost; worst of all there have been innumerable hours of human suffering caused by the pain of slow death from the effects of asbestos, beryllium, carbon monoxide, coal dust, cotton dust, cancer-causing chemicals, pesticides, radiation and other occupational hazards."

And, he warned, the rate of occupational injuries is on the rise because "private industry has not taken the necessary steps to make the workplace safe and healthy."

Biemiller said the substitute bill the Administration is supporting, however well-intentioned, is weaker and would be less effective than the O'Hara bill.

Abel said the substitute "would set up paper standards that employers and workers would rely upon at their peril."

Stressing the need for federal action, Abel told the subcommittee members that national safety and health codes are essential.

"The life and health of workers are equally precious in every state,"

5.4% Boost for Postal Jobs:

Vote on Federal Pay Defies Veto Threat

The House defied a presidential veto threat and overwhelmingly approved a retroactive 5.4 percent pay raise for 700,000 postal workers and a new pay-setting system for all salaried government employes.

A letter from Pres. Nixon opposing the legislation, read by House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford, failed to stem the tide of support for the labor-backed bill.

Nixon said the pay raise would "seriously undercut" the government's efforts to curb inflation and would force cutbacks in postal service and a slash in federal employment.

Letter Carriers Pres. James H. Rademacher denounced Nixon's letter as "the crudest form of political blackmail." He said there is no cause to cut back postal services to the American people because postal workers ask "a living wage."

Republicans as well as Democrats ignored the President's appeal.

First the House defeated a motion to recommit the bill to committee for further study. The vote against recommittal was 281-81. Then the bill was passed, 310-52, and sent to the Senate.

The only change made in the bill brought out by the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee was a modification of the proposed pay-setting procedure for future increases.

The bill establishes a salary commission of government and union representatives. Under the original committee bill, it would have made recommendations for pay adjustments each year which would have taken effect in 30 days—retroactive to Jan. 1—unless vetoed by either house of Congress.

By a 191-169 vote, the House amended the bill to require affirmative action by Congress before the annual increases took effect. Congress would have to act within 60

House Votes 12-Hour Limit On Railroads

The House voted unanimously to update a 62-year-old law and set a legal limit of 12 hours as the maximum on-duty time for railroad train crews.

The present limit, set by a 1907 rail safety law, allowed train crews to be worked as long as 16 hours without a break.

The new legislation, urged by railroad labor and the AFL-CIO, specifies that "deadhead" travel time to and from work assignments will be counted towards the 12-hour limit.

It also specifically declares that the new 12-hour limit does not preclude railroad unions and man-

Two 20% Boosts Asked For Social Security

Rep. Jacob H. Gilbert (D-N.Y.) has improved a social security bill he introduced last month in the light of new figures on the financial status of the Social Security Trust Fund.

Gilbert's new measure, expected to be introduced next week, drew immediate support from the AFL-CIO and the National Council of Senior Citizens. They also backed his earlier bill.

At a press conference, Gilbert recalled that in introducing his legislation in September he said he would revise it to improve its benefits "if there is more money available than anticipated."

Recently, the Social Security Administration reported that the fund has an actuarial balance of 1.16 percent of taxable payroll compared to a 0.53 percent balance previously anticipated.

Therefore, Gilbert said, his new bill will call for two 20 percent across-the-board increases in benefits, the first effective Jan. 1, 1970, and the second to begin Jan. 1, 1972.

Gilbert's first bill would have provided increases of 10 percent,

Labor Ministers Urged To Back Free Unions

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called on Western Hemisphere governments to give their fullest support to "those of us who make the case for freedom and justice" for workers and their families.

He also strongly re-emphasized U.S. labor's opposition to dictatorships "from either the right or the left" in an address to the Third Inter-American Conference of Labor Ministers in Washington.

The week-long conference, sponsored by the Organization of American States, was attended by ministers of labor from 23 countries in the hemisphere. Most delegations also included union leaders.

Two previous labor ministers' conferences were held, in 1963 in Colombia and 1966 in Venezuela. The purpose of the conferences is to develop effective participation by labor and labor ministries in social and economic development.

Reports on the status of projects agreed to at previous conferences and working papers prepared by OAS formed the basis for the work of the conference's plenary sessions and working committees.

In a message to the conference,

White House Effort Fails to Rally Support for Haynsworth Nomination

ing to take part in the pro-Haynsworth dialogue.

Sen. Marlow W. Cook (R-Ky.) opened with a "refutation" of the conflict-of-interest cases documented in a report by Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.). Cook argued that the effect of the judge's decisions on stock he held in companies which were involved in the lawsuits would have been negligible, even if he had decided against the corporations instead of for them.

But only a half-dozen of the Senate's conservative bloc chose to join in the defense of Haynsworth.

- Present indications are that the Administration will have to go outside of the ranks of the Senate Republican leadership to find a senator willing to serve as floor leader of the pro-Haynsworth forces.

Two of the GOP leaders, Republican Whip Robert P. Griffin (Mich.) and Senate Republican Conference Chairman Margaret Chase Smith (Me.), have said they will vote against the nomination. GOP Leader Hugh Scott (Pa.), who had urged the President not to nominate Haynsworth, has refused to lead the confirmation battle. And Sen. Gordon Allott (Colo.), chairman of the Republican Policy Committee, told newsmen that he will not be the floor leader for Haynsworth. He indicated that the role would probably fall to Sen. Roman L. Hruska (Neb.).

- The New York State Trial Lawyers Association called on the Senate to reject the nomination if it is not withdrawn. A unanimous resolution of the board of directors attacked Haynsworth's "lack of sensitivity" to conflicts of interest.
- An influential, previously uncommitted senator, Commerce Committee Chairman Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.), announced his opposition to Haynsworth, citing his civil rights decisions and "anti-labor" record.

Meany recited the efforts of the AFL-CIO to dissuade the President from making the nomination after it was known that Haynsworth was under consideration.

He stressed that a presidential nomination should only be opposed "for very, very serious reasons" and noted that labor did not oppose Nixon's appointment of Chief Justice Burger.

The AFL-CIO is opposing Haynsworth, Meany said, because he is "not qualified" to serve on "the greatest judicial body in the world."

Louis Nelson Dies, ILGWU Pioneer

New York—Louis Nelson, garment union pioneer who had intended to retire as a union officer in November, died here after a heart attack. He was 75.

At his death Nelson was manager of Knitgoods Local 155 of the Ladies' Garment Workers and an ILGWA vice president.

Born in Russia, Nelson came here at the age of 12. He was a machine operator in men's garment shops and until 1925 was active in the Clothing Workers. By 1933 he was a dress-industry organizer for the ILGWU.

New Term Opens:

26 Labor Cases In Supreme Court

The Supreme Court began its 180th term with a new chief justice, one vacant chair and 63 cases on its docket—26 of them involving issues in dispute between labor and management.

Chief Justice Warren E. Burger replaced the retired Earl Warren when the court assembled for the start of its fall term.

The seat formerly occupied by Justice Abe Fortas is awaiting an occupant as Pres. Nixon's nomination of Appeals Court Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., for the vacancy remains embroiled in controversy in the Senate.

The justices at their first public session of the term agreed to review four labor-management cases, refused a rehearing to employers in the landmark Gissel Packing Co. case, and declined to review 17 other labor-related decisions by lower U.S. courts.

In the Gissel case, the high court last June unanimously upheld the authority of the National Labor Relations Board to order an employer to bargain with a union on the basis of membership applications from a majority of employes. The board had found that the employer unlawfully destroyed the union's majority by unfair practices, including threats and promises.

Arguments on Four Cases

Among the four cases on which the court will hear arguments is one in which the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ordered the H. K. Porter Co., Inc., Danville, Va., to give the Steelworkers a dues checkoff clause in their contract to remedy company unfair practices.

The D.C. court held that the Taft-Hartley Act does not prohibit the labor board from ordering "a company which has repeatedly flouted its . . . duty to make meaningful and reasonable counter offers, or indeed even to make a concession" as "the only way for the company to purge the stain of bad faith that has already soiled its position. . . . Such action by the company may be the only means of assuring the board, and the court, that it no longer harbors an illegal intent."

The case was returned to the NLRB, which ordered Porter to give the union the right to collect dues by checkoff when the employe agrees to authorize such a deduction. The appeals court enforced the NLRB decision and Porter again appealed.

Among the cases still on the court's docket are appeals for review of these NLRB decisions:

- Prudential Life Insurance Co. must give the Insurance Workers a name-and-address list of employes. The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, upholding the Labor Board, said such information "is the core of the employer-employe relationship."
- Rutter-Rex Manufacturing Co., New Orleans, was ordered to reinstate more than 200 members of the Clothing Workers and give them backpay. An NLRB regional director ordered payment of $324,000 in lost income to 206 fired workers. A trial examiner cut it to $159,000 for 171 workers, and the union objected. The company refused to comply with the board order.
- Hevi-Duty Electric Co., Goldsboro, N.C., demanded a hearing on the validity of an election won by the Communications Workers. The NLRB ruled that an investigation failed to disclose any "material and substantial factual issues" involved, and the 4th U.S. Circuit Court upheld the board.
- General Metals Products Co. in Humboldt, Tenn., was held responsible for a campaign by community leaders which brought defeat of the Machinists in a 1967 election campaign. The 6th U.S. Court of Appeals agreed and ordered a new election. The company appealed.
- Two locals of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters won an NLRB ruling that they had the right to strike to enforce a valid work-preservation clause. The 8th U.S. Circuit Court agreed and the American Boiler Manufacturers Association appealed.

NLRB Definition

In other pending cases, these legal questions are at issue:

Can a company refuse to bargain with a union because management objects to the NLRB's definition of a bargaining unit? Involved are the Continental Insurance Co., the NLRB and the Teamsters.

Can the NLRB refuse to reopen a case and issue a ruling on its own authority without further hearings? The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decided that it could not, and ordered the NLRB to reopen the case. The principals are District 50 and Buffalo Pepsi-Cola bottlers.

Under what conditions does a successor company have to bargain with unions already in the plant? The NLRB upheld two Cadillac dealers in Los Angeles against the Machinists and the Painters. The D.C. Appeals Court agreed with the board that the dealers did not have to bargain.

AFL-CIO Kicks Off Fund For Striking Oil Workers

Establishment of a special fund to aid members of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers on strike against Mobil Oil Co. has been announced by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

In a letter to all affiliates, Meany urged unions and their members to give "all possible financial assistance" to the fund which was started with a $10,000 contribution voted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

Meany noted that the union is experiencing its fourth major strike effort of the year. The union has handled its financial burden alone, Meany said, "but now its treasury has been drained and OCAW urgently needs financial help."

The current strike began Sept. 1 when OCAW struck Mobil on behalf of the Socony Mobil Tankerman's group. It is "an especially costly operation," Meany explained, because "strikers must be cared for far from home in the port in which their ship is tied up."

U.S. Weighs Shift:

Gains, Pitfalls Seen In Metric System

Housewives, school children and businessmen would benefit "tremendously" from proposed changes in the American system of weights and measures but there would also be some disadvantages, the current American Federationist points out.

Comparison shopping would be easier under the metric system now used by nations comprising 90 percent of the world's people, Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc., writes in the magazine's October issue on "Metrics: the Modern World Standard."

Children learning arithmetic could learn how to multiply and add fractions in about three-quarters of the time now required, some educators have estimated.

Other experts report that the United States is losing up to $20 billions a year in foreign trade because some products based on our measure are "worthless" on the world market.

But "switching to metric" would involve "tremendous cost and inconvenience," Conn notes. He cites a prediction by economists at the Stanford Research Institute that a change-over would cost the nation "something like $11 billion over a 20-year period."

The cost, however, "would be more than made up by increased business and productivity," the same source predicts.

The magazine was published shortly before the eighth AFL-CIO convention adopted a policy statement urging that protection for workers be written into any law that Congress may adopt in the event the United States switches from pounds, feet and quarts to kilograms, meters and liters.

The worker's investment in tools, his experience and the cost of retraining should all be taken into consideration by the Metric Study Commission, the convention said.

The commission was authorized a year ago and must report its findings to Congress within three years. Unless a change to the metric system occurs, the United States and Canada could be the only major countries to continue using the old system, the AFL-CIO noted.

Conn's article asserts that "certainly, for the consumer it offers rich rewards—a simple basis for determining actual pricing and . . . for comparison of value."

The metric system, he adds, "could make the intent of the Fair Packaging & Labeling Act" a reality.

Reciting history, Conn relates that the nation's founding fathers had the foresight and genius to provide this country with the decimal money system, officially adopted by Congress in 1786. But they clung to English weights and measures because "the British so dominated the commercial world that we felt we could not afford" to change.

The French officially adopted the metric system in 1799, and in 1940 made it compulsory throughout France.

The article sums up: "In the 150 years since the metric system first won acceptance, not a single country or a single industry has regretted adopting it. . . .

"If the United States should accept it, it is likely that few if any consumers will regret it. . . ."

Last year, under the prodding of Sen. Claiborne Pell (D-R.I.), Congress passed the Metric System Study Bill. Although no funds have yet been appropriated, the study is moving ahead with funds advanced by the National Bureau of Standards.

The bureau is considering three approaches:

The dual system approach would use both English and metric measurements. The butcher's scale, for example, would be marked off in pounds, but with the recognition that 2.2 pounds equals one kilogram. Packaged items would contain both English and metric measures.

Another approach would be "adaptation." Measuring instruments and products would be expressed in metrics, but containers such as coffee cans and milk bottles would remain unchanged.

The third approach would be complete conversion to the metric system, using no other. Sizes for new items would be figured in round numbers in metric units.

"Both proponents and opponents of the metric system are fully aware," the Federationist article says, "of both the advantages and disadvantages of the metric system."

SCORES OF PICKETS parade outside the Defense Dept. offices in New York City to protest the purchase of California table grapes by the Pentagon for shipment to servicemen in Viet Nam. The pickets, members of New York unions, later moved to a downtown store of the Gristede food chain, which has failed to join other city supermarkets in the boycott of the California grapes.

ILO Parley Drafts Safeguards For Iron, Steel Workers' Income

Geneva—An International Labor Organization conference has drafted guidelines for insuring the income of iron and steel workers against technological and structural changes in their industry.

The 206 union, employer and government delegates from 23 nations also charted a program to give workers a voice in industry and company plans because of the impact these have on their lives.

William Moran, Steelworkers district director and executive board member, said when addressing the closing meeting of the ILO iron and steel committee that the two-week session had been "very helpful" to the industrialized nations and "tremendously helpful" to the newly developing countries.

The conference's unanimous choice as worker vice chairman, Moran served on the subcommittee that prepared recommendations on ways to insure a "rapid and appropriate solution" to the damaging social effects that could result from development in the industry.

The subcommittee gave special attention to protection of employment, wage and income security of iron and steel workers.

Meyer Bernstein, Steelworkers international affairs director, was the second member of the team representing U.S. workers at the committee's first meeting in six years.

Bernstein, when commenting on programming and planning in the iron and steel industry, noted with satisfaction that the U.S. employer delegation had done a "complete about-face."

"We are very pleased," he said, "that the employers, particularly the Americans, who arrived with such strong opposition to the whole notion of workers' rights, ended up by approving the recommendations."

Bernstein served as a spokesman of the worker delegates on the subcommittee that drafted recommendations on the workers' role in industry planning. They were unanimously adopted by the conference, as were the findings on income and job security.

The role of collective bargaining was stressed by Bernstein in the discussion on how to prepare for the impact of technological and other developments in the industry. The conference concluded that all programs charting the industry's future should include measures to protect its workers from the "economic and social consequences of redundancy and other hardships."

On the question of job and income security, the committee found that an "active search" should always be made for alternatives to the dismissal of workers. Among the alternatives suggested were "compensated shorter week, early retirement, longer vacations, controls on overtime work."

The committee stressed that "dismissals should not be an occasion for discrimination, arbitrary preferences or reprisal against workers who make use of their democratic or trade union rights."

"Any worker," the recommendation added, "should have the opportunity, with assistance from his trade union organization, to appeal against such dismissal to a body empowered to act."

In a resolution endorsed by employers and government delegates as well as workers, the committee recognized the "paramount importance of the free exercise of trade union rights in improving wages and other conditions of work in the iron and steel industry everywhere in the world."

The committee also urged the ILO's executive body to call another session "with the shortest possible delay" because of the many problems raised by the rapid changes within the industry.

Rail Shopcraft Unions Ask 'Meaningful' Talks

A presidential emergency board held hearings on the dispute between four shopcraft unions and six railroads after being urged by the unions to insist on "meaningful" negotiations.

The unions—Machinists, Boilermakers, Sheet Metal Workers and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers—have been trying for more than a year to get a 10 percent boost in basic wages plus an added 20 cents an hour for skills.

Unsuccessful, they set an Oct. 4 strike deadline on six railroads—the Santa Fe, Great Northern, Erie-Lackawanna, Illinois Central, Southern, Chesapeake & Ohio-Baltimore & Ohio—where they represent 45,000 workers.

A strike on only six railroads would not constitute a "national emergency" and government intervention, the unions contended. But the carriers threatened to lock out workers on other major railroads, and Pres. Nixon appointed an emergency board. Under the Railway Labor Act, both sides are prevented from resorting to "self help" for a period of at least 60 days.

IAM Vice Pres. William Winpisinger, who testified for the unions, told the board "the most valuable contribution it could make would be to insist on genuine collective bargaining in this dispute."

After describing the unions' demands as "modest," he charged the carriers have obstinately refused to negotiate. He estimated there had been only about 13 hours of face-to-face talks, another eight hours of mediation. The last bargaining sesion was June 26, he said.

Winpisinger sharply critized the National Mediation Board for certifying a threatened strike on only six railroads to the White House as an emergency instead of making a greater effort to secure real bargaining.

Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz "did a remarkable job" in trying to get talks going, Winpisinger said, but this was thwarted by conditions laid down by railroad management.

The IAM vice president emphasized that the unions "could not possibly agree" to two of the conditions—that the Mediation Board oversee bargaining and that any strike by the unions must be against all of the nation's railroads.

He pointed out that the union could not agree to board supervision because of its past "inept" record in handling the case. To require a national strike, he asserted, would simply create a new emergency, completely nullifying the right to strike.

Noting that nearly a year has passed since the unions first served their wage notices, he suggested that any proposed settlement be for a two-year period so the unions would not have to start right over again on negotiations.

Winpisinger also denounced the railroads' demand before the board that the unions acept so-called "pattern" adjustments that other unions have made. "The imposition of patterns doesn't meet the need in this case," he said.

Ralph T. Seward, a Washington arbitrator, is board chairman. Other members are Robert Livernash of Harvard University and Robert Howlett, head of the Michigan State Mediation Service.

Bakery Workers' Strike Shuts 13 Nabisco Plants

A strike against National Biscuit Co. has halted production at 13 Nabisco plants in 10 states and no settlement is in sight, the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers reported in the fifth week of the contract dispute.

The strike by more than 9,000 workers started Sept. 7, ABC said, because of company insistence that union members accept its "final offer" of a wage and fringe package the union called "totally unrealistic."

The strike is the third the union has had with present management in the last four years, after 30 years of smooth relations with the firm.

Other unions are respecting ABC picket lines and are expected to join the strikers as their contracts expire.

ABC is picketing Nabisco plants in Fair Lawn, N.J.; Buffalo, N.Y.; Pittsburgh, Philadelphia and York, Pa.; Atlanta, Houston, St. Louis, Chicago, Denver, Oakland and Buena Park, Calif., and Portland, Ore.

The company has refused to include any cost-of-living formula in a new contract and also refuses to take any note of an 11 percent increase in costs since the last agreement was negotiated two years ago, the union reported.

The company has declined to provide full hospital coverage for employes, as two major competitors have done.

ABC's proposal for correction of inequities between the company pension plan and the union-industry plan in effect elsewhere also failed to budge the management, ABC said.

National Biscuit Co. dominates the biscuit industry to a far greater extent than General Motors dominates the auto industry, the union said. Last year its profits after taxes totaled nearly $42 million.

Quality Education for All

IT HAS LONG BEEN the position of the AFL-CIO that free public education should no longer be limited to 12 years of school. For the very young, especially those who have been economically deprived, pre-kindergarten classes have proved to be of great benefit in improving further educational achievement.

Beyond high school, free education should be available to all young people at least through the fourteenth school year, and a combination of federal scholarships, low tuition or free tuition, and work-study opportunities is needed to insure that every young person has an opportunity to obtain higher education. Existing federal programs of loans to students have been helpful, but they are clearly not a sufficient answer to the mounting costs of higher education.

THE POPULATION EXPLOSION which began in the period following World War II has now reached the college campuses and it has been accompanied by an unprecedented wave of student unrest.

The right to dissent and to protest is essential to the American democratic process, and in most cases, student unrest has had its roots in legitimate and long standing grievances. Universities must develop meaningful methods of student participation to thwart the irresponsible few who seek to exploit legitimate grievances for their own destructive purposes.

Various laws have been proposed in Congress to deal with student unrest and all of them are dangerous. Some proposed legislation would withhold federal aid from colleges and universities which have been marked by student disorder. This would have the effect of penalizing the many for the misdeeds of the few. Other proposals would withhold student aid from students participating in campus disorders. This would amount to class legislation, penalizing low-income students who depend upon federal aid, but doing nothing in regard to students who were affluent enough to pay their own way.

The disciplining of students who go beyond the reasonable limits of dissent is a matter best handled by the universities, and where appropriate, by the civil authorities. It is not appropriate for the federal government to inject itself into matters of student discipline.

THERE IS NEED for expanded services in the field of adult education. Programs in adult basic education have achieved impressive results, but available funds have not permitted expansion of these programs to the levels which are needed.

Federal support for workers' education has been too long delayed; training workers for effective leadership in their unions deserves a place alongside other federally financed adult training programs.

Increased longevity has resulted in an unprecedented proportion of senior citizens in our population; special programs should be developed to make their years of retirement meaningful. There is a need among older adults who often have failing eyesight for more books and other publications printed in large type editions.

To provide the range of programs needed if Americans, both young and old, are to have within their reach the quality education which they need, will require money which is not now being invested in education. This money must in the largest part come from the federal government which alone has the taxing power to meet the needs.

'A Bit Big for You, Isn't It?'

A Word Edgewise:

Massachusetts Victory Model For Democratic Party Unity

By John P. Roche

WORD HAS GONE OUT that the victory of Michael Harrington over William Saltonstall in the special congressional election up in the Massachusetts 6th District was a major triumph for the "new politics."

Harrington, so the story goes, overcame a powerful Republican tradition by going to the people with the real issues, opposing deployment of the ABM and calling for immediate withdrawal from Southeast Asia. A widely circulated analysis by a local political reporter put it this way: Harrington won "Republican votes because of the Viet Nam issue . . . in a district which the Republican candidate last November carried with 67 percent of the vote, and the spread between Nixon and Humphrey was more than 13 percent."

Read that last sentence again. If normal word order has any significance we would assume that this was a good, safe GOP district in which Richard Nixon beat Hubert Humphrey last fall by 13 percent. Thus for Harrington to beat Saltonstall was a real David and Goliath performance. However for the benefit of those unsuspecting souls who assume that a reporter always writes straight news, the record must be clarified. In 1968 Humphrey beat Nixon in the 6th District, receiving 60 percent of the vote. Moreover, while Harrington won by about 6,500 votes, Humphrey won by 50,000.

In other words, the Sixth is a solidly Democratic district which has had one odd custom: as long as a Bates ran for Congress, it would send him to Washington. Father and son, the Bateses had held the seat for the GOP since the memory of man runneth not to the contrary.

The Times has referred to the district as "traditionally Republican territory," so let me add that in 1960 John Kennedy got 57 percent of the vote, and in 1964 Lyndon Johnson received an unbelievable 75 percent! (In fact, since 1936, Dwight Eisenhower was the only Republican nominee for President who carried Essex County, where the Sixth is located.)

By this time, readers may be wondering why Harrington won so weakly in such a friendly bailiwick. The temptation is to say that his views on the ABM and Viet Nam lost him a great deal of support, but this is as preposterous as attributing his win to revolutionary forces in the Democratic Party.

Actually, Harrington's election was a model of how the Democrats should start behaving. Just about every Democrat in the state over the age of 16 pitched in to help him. While a number of Democrats were unhappy about this or that particular position the candidate took, all hands agreed that they wanted to see him elected. (And a Saltonstall is always hard to beat.)

The AFL-CIO, for example, was hardly enthusiastic about Harrington's Viet Nam views, but organized labor put tremendous effort into the campaign.

Former Vice Pres. Humphrey appeared on TV with Harrington and (with a clear statement that he did not endorse an unconditional Viet Nam pull-out) strongly endorsed Harrington as the liberal candidate. Senators Muskie and McGovern also gave him an assist. Finally, state Democratic leaders, who generally can be expected to vote against anything proposed by anyone else, rallied in a fashion which led the superstitious to anticipate that the end of the world was at hand.

The Democrats, to put it bluntly, behaved like a serious political party, not a revivalist sect. Laying aside the passion for excommunication which has enlivened the national councils of the party, "old" and "new" politics were fused into an effective campaign. Harrington's friends from the Eugene McCarthy crusade decided they could work with men whom a year ago they were denouncing as immoral "warmongers."

Conversely, men who once got apopletic at the thought of "radicals" in the Democratic Party, joined the common cause and worked like dogs for Harrington. The result was the forging locally of a coalition which, if imitated throughout the country, could re-establish the strength of the Democratic Party.

The fundamental philosophy of this coalition was well defined by one leading Democrat who happens to share my opposition to Harrington's policy on Viet Nam. "Look," he said, "I think Mike is cockeyed on Viet Nam, but we agree on almost everything else. So, I'll save my argument on Viet Nam—and hold it with Congressman Harrington."

Shift to Right?:

Political Balance of Country Hinges On Outcome of '70 Vote

The following is excerpted from "The Pivotal 1970 Elections," by John M. Barry which appears in the October 1969 issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

THE 1970 OFF-YEAR ELECTIONS pose a particularly crucial challenge for organized labor and, indeed, for American liberalism.

The voters next year will choose all 435 members of the House of Representatives, 35 members of the Senate and 35 state governors. They will decide which party controls the 45 state legislatures to be contested and elect thousands of lesser office-holders in city and county governments.

But the stakes go far beyond a mere recital of numbers. At issue, basically, will be the very direction of the nation, possibly for years to come.

Will conservatism tighten its grip on the machinery of government? Or will the American people commit themselves to solving the pressing problems of poverty and hunger, education and jobs, pollution and health? Will the progressive social programs seeded under the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations be brought to fruition? Or will they wither as the budget-cutters continue to deny them the nourishment of federal financing?

Since Pres. Johnson's landslide victory of 1964 the political pendulum in the United States has been swinging toward the right. Last year the conservative forces gained control of the White House by electing Republican Richard M. Nixon.

In the process, they also gained an opportunity to transform the Supreme Court into an instrument of conservative philosophy, and Nixon has been quick to take advantage of this in his first two appointments to the high court.

Thus, of the three constitutional branches of the federal government, the executive is lost and the judicial is slipping away, so that only in the legislative branch—Congress—do liberals now have a handhold and a chance to improve their position. If Congress, too, should shift further to the right in 1970, the chances for any sort of liberal legislative program in the 92nd Congress would be all but nil.

Even now, liberal strength in Congress is slim. The Democratic Party is in the majority, 243 to 188 in the House with four vacancies and 57 to 43 in the Senate. This, of course, gives the party command of committee and subcommittee chairmanships, a number of which are held by staunch liberals who have built up seniority over the years.

But party labels alone don't tell the whole story. Liberals hold only a slight edge in the Senate, and the loss of just a few seats could destroy their margin. A turnover of only eight would give control to the Republicans.

The position of liberals in the House currently is even shakier. Not all House members are easily categorized, but Congressional Quarterly, a nonpartisan publication, makes a biennial attempt to do so. When the 91st Congress was elected last year, CQ identified 170 House members as liberals, 189 as conservatives and 76 as moderates, only a slight shift from the previous Congress.

In the states, conservative gains during recent years are starkly evident. Thirty of the 50 governors, for example, are Republicans whereas just five years ago the GOP held only 17 statehouses.

And of course the Democrat-Republican breakdown doesn't give an accurate picture of the odds the liberal-labor bloc faces in the fight for the various statehouses. As in the case of many senators who wear the name "Democrat," several of the governorships are held by conservatives whose party affiliation matters little. And several of the Republican governors are more liberal than their Democratic predecessors.

ON A PARTY BASIS, the state legislatures are almost evenly divided, with both chambers controlled by the Republicans in 20 states and by the Democrats in 21. But only 10 of the Democratic legislatures are outside the deep South.

The election of state legislatures holds special significance in 1970 because they will have the responsibility of replotting congressional districts on the basis of next year's decennial U.S. Census. And while the federal courts have set down rather rigid one-man, one-vote guidelines, gerrymandering can still favor one party over the other.

One big thing the Democrats have going for them is the historical trend of off-year elections. With only one clear-cut exception in this century—the 1934 election during the first Administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt—the opposition has scored gains at mid-term over the party in the White House. The shift in the House has averaged close to 40 seats in recent years.

Statistics alone make it clear that Democratic candidates will be vulnerable in the 1970 election. The current House roster includes 77 members who won their seats by 55 percent of the popular vote or less. Of these, 51 are Democrats and only 26 are Republicans. The Democrats in this category include 42 who carried the endorsement of COPE into the last election, whereas none of the Republicans in marginal districts had the backing of labor's political arm.

On the Senate side, 25 seats held by Democrats will be up for election against only 10 held by Republicans, including the Illinois seat of the late GOP Minority Leader, Everett McKinley Dirksen, which has been filled by Republican Ralph T. Smith but will be subject to a special election to fill the last four years of the term.

Particular targets of the GOP, with few exceptions, will be the eight Democratic seats won by less than 55 percent of the vote when they were last contested.

The senators up for re-election include the noted Class of '58 whose capture of 13 seats from the Republicans that year was described by one GOP conservative as a "social revolution" that brought the Democrats from a scant two-seat edge in the Senate to a margin of 62 to 34. Liberals in the group were totally re-elected when Johnson led the party to its sweeping victory in 1964. But in 1970 they face far greater odds.

Extension of Goals:

Freedom of Workers Stressed In Foreign Activities of Labor

OVERSEAS ACTIVITIES of American labor are an "extension of what the labor movement is all about," the chairman of the AFL-CIO International Affairs Committee said in a network radio interview.

Stressing that free trade unionism can't exist in totalitarianism, Joseph A. Beirne, president of the Communications Workers and a vice president of the AFL-CIO, said it is essential that the American labor movement participate as a "strong advocate of freedom among people." To do otherwise, he said, "would risk serious weakening of our position as a society—hence as workers in that society."

"For us to preserve our contracts . . . and the rights we have to bargain on our wages and our working conditions, means that the world must be kept in such balance that it is not overrun by those who follow the totalitarian design," he declared.

Beirne, who is also the author of the soon-to-be published book, "Challenge to Labor" (Prentice-Hall) appeared on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO-produced public affairs interview broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. EDT, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Beirne said that the AFL-CIO's withdrawal from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions was a "hard and sad decision," but that there was "no alternative, in light of actions recommended at one time by the leadership of the ICFTU." He said that the AFL-CIO is continuing its efforts to iron out differences with the ICFTU, so that the AFL-CIO can renew its relationship with the organization and "continue to make a contribution" to its work.

THREE LANDMARK labor measures established the labor-management relations laws we have today.

The Wagner Act, for the first time, recognized the right of workers to organize unions and enjoy the benefits of collective bargaining.

In 1947 the Taft-Hartley Act was passed. It established restrictions on the rights of unions and further infringements were written into the Landrum-Griffin Act in 1957.

Organized labor has filed numerous grievances since 1947 alleging that many provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act limit the effectiveness of unions, deny them full freedom to protect the interest of their members and weaken their organizing activities.

At the Building & Construction Trades Dept. convention in Atlantic City and later at the Industrial Union Dept. convention, two of these grievances were documented.

Louis Sherman, general counsel of the building trades department, discussed the "increasing number of rejections of contracts which have been negotiated by union leadership" and stated this was directly related to provisions of Landrum-Griffin.

Landrum-Griffin, he said, has "weakened the ties of obligation" within the labor movement, eroding the "relationship between the individual and his local and between the local and the international."

"I am not claiming," he said, "that all evil comes from the Landrum-Griffin Act or that all disturbances that occur are due to its provisions. It is obvious that the economic situation has a good deal to do with the problem. It is obvious also that there is a certain spirit of dissidence and revolt which has manifested itself in such once quiet places as the universities.

"But I think that any student of the subject who views the problem objectively and factually must come away with the conclusion that the Landrum-Griffin Act, conceived in the spirit of so-called virtue, has had a great deal to do with our current problems in this area."

Fundamentally, Sherman believes that Landrum-Griffin has served to undercut the "important but intangible quality" of union leadership.

Sherman stressed that most union constitutions do not bar the right of an individual to go to court but only after he has exhausted all internal remedies and appeals first.

LANDRUM-GRIFFIN, he said, has changed that. It has helped to divide many unions, giving "the full weight of federal law that in a sense has become a fomenter of dissidence and dissension," adding:

"I think that with the impact of the disintegration on the labor relations scene in terms of these contract rejections, there may be a more willing ear on the part of the public and the government."

The IUD convention dealt with another problem, the inadequacies of relief under the labor laws.

"The basic labor law policies of the federal government have been subverted," an IUD resolution declared, "and the National Labor Relations Act has become virtually a license for union-busting. Nearly 35 years after the Wagner Act was passed the simple brutal discharge of union adherents is still the most common of all employer unfair labor practices."

The convention noted that many employers, particularly J. P. Stevens, "have engaged in conduct openly repudiating the labor laws of the United States."

The problem is that NLRB and court procedures are so slow that it takes years for the cases to be resolved and during this period the unionization of the workers has often been aborted.

There is another aspect of the problem to which IUD gave attention. This was the fact that even if an anti-union employer is found guilty and has to make his workers "whole" by providing them with back pay, he still stands to profit.

The IUD seeks to take the profit out of anti-unionism.

It would do this by providing double and triple damages against chronic violators of the law, and employes would be made whole for losses sustained as a consequence of the employer's refusal to bargain.

U.S. LABOR'S overseas activities are an "extension of what the labor movement is all about," Communications Workers Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, center, said on Labor News Conference. Questioning the AFL-CIO vice president and author of the forthcoming book "Challenge to Labor," were Tom Walton, left, of the Toledo Blade and Leon Hughes of the Milwaukee Journal. The interview program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Stalled Talks Spur Strike of D.C. Musicians

The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service renewed efforts to get stalemated contract talks between the Musicians and the National Symphony Association resumed after union negotiators accused management of stalling and walked out on strike.

The walkout led management to cancel two concerts that would have opened the symphony orchestra's season, and the union to put the association on its unfair list.

At issue are wages, a longer work year and touring conditions that union members call "unsafe and unfair."

Orchestra members, who received a $200 minimum wage under the old contract, want a $50 increase in a two-year pact; 52 weeks of work a year, and improved working and travel conditions.

Sec. J. Martin Emerson of AFM Local 161-710 said the players also want a regular day off every week, a reduced work load, and better pension and medical plans, among other things.

Originally management offered only to extend the old contract for another season without major improvements. Later it offered increases of $15, $20 and $20 a week in successive years and a 48-week season instead of the former 45 weeks.

Emerson said union negotiators adjourned the talks "because we weren't making any progress."

Senior Center Shop Honors Late Unionist

Seattle—The Evan M. Weston Memorial Workshop at the Four Freedoms House retirement home here was dedicated to honor the veteran labor leader.

Weston, retired president of the Washington State AFL-CIO, died Aug. 26 while attending the state federation convention.

The workshop is equipped with hand tools, power tools, work benches and other handicraft hobby facilities to accommodate the 350 residents of the retirement apartment building. The residents represent more than 60 different unions.

Donations from local unions throughout the state were used to buy the equipment. Additional contributions from unions and friends of Weston will be used to add more equipment.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a message read at the dedication, noted that "Weston's many friends, who made this hobby room possible, are paying tribute to a great unionist in a manner consistent with his personal creed of helping his fellow man."

Weston's widow, Norma, participated in the dedication ceremonies. Speakers included Chester Romage of the state Dept. of Labor & Industry; Ralph Baird, director of the Four Freedoms House, and Kenneth Flemming of the state federation.

CREDIT UNION AUDIT

A complete verification of accounts of all members of the AFL-CIO Employes Federal Credit Union was made as of Sept. 30, 1969. Members who do not receive statements by Oct. 31, 1969, are asked to notify the Chairman, Supervisory Committee, Room 711, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C., 20006.

LONGSHOREMEN'S PRES. Thomas W. Gleason is introduced to National Maritime Union convention by Pres. Joseph Curran.

Clothing Union Opens New Day Care Center

Baltimore—A spacious day care center for the small children of working mothers was dedicated here Oct. 11 by Gov. Marvin Mandel and officials of the Clothing Workers.

The center was the product of a collective bargaining agreement between the Baltimore regional joint board of the union and clothing employers in the area. It is financed by a 2 percent tax on the employers' gross payroll.

The Baltimore center will take care of 325 children, in the 2-6 age range. The tots will be under the care of a staff of 35 persons, including a cook and a registered nurse.

A similar center was opened several months ago by the regional joint board at Verona, Va. A center is now under construction at Chambersburg, Pa., and others are planned at Hanover and McConnellsburg, Pa.

Sam Nocella, ACWA vice-president and head of the joint board, was a prime mover in the program to build the facilities. On a trip to Europe, he observed similar centers in a number of countries and returned with a determination to develop similar projects in his area.

Speaking at the dedication ceremony, Nocella looked forward to an eventual chain of centers that will accommodate 2,000 children. He noted that state-operated centers in Pennsylvania take care of only about a thousand, and Maryland provides care facilities for only about 2,000 boys and girls.

ACWA Pres. Jacob Potofsky, praising Nocella's work in establishing the Baltimore project, noted that "in the long run, the only way this country can meet our day care needs will be through government support."

"But," Potofsky added, "government efforts so far have been inadequate, and the center we dedicate today is our way of taking action to meet a problem, not just talking about it."

The Baltimore center is named for the late Hyman Blumberg, executive vice president of the ACWA for many years and before that a leader of the union in the Baltimore area.

Also to honor Blumberg's memory, the union presented a check for $108,000 to Johns Hopkins University for a series of annual conferences and research projects on all aspects of early childhood education.

The Baltimore center is located in an inner city residential area, not far from most of the city's clothing industry plants. A long one-story building, it is shaped in a quadrangle that encloses a play area longer than a football field.

Most of the structure is composed of classrooms—complete with tot-sized furniture and facilities. In addition, there are administrative offices, a kitchen-dining area and quarters for a full-time registered nurse.

Minneapolis Unit Cited In Aiding Retarded

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Minneapolis AFL-CIO has won the third annual merit award of the National Association for Retarded Children for volunteer work to aid the mentally retarded. The state labor body was cited particularly for sponsorship of a project employing low-income senior citizens to work with the retarded. NARC made the announcement at its 20th convention.

UNION REPRESENTATIVES from all parts of the free world came to Washington following their attendance at the AFL-CIO convention in Atlantic City to confer with Federation Pres. George Meany, Dept. of International Affairs staff and federation officials at the AFL-CIO headquarters.

Convention Cites Decline:

NMU Spurs Program To Bolster Shipping

New York—A program designed to halt the decline of American-flag shipping by positive action "on the waterfront, at the ballot box and in the legislative halls" was approved by delegates to the 15th convention of the National Maritime Union.

The convention adopted a policy statement declaring "a positive national program must be swiftly enacted to promote all types of shipping." It said the program "must include greatly increased attention to the maritime fields of the future—deepsea fishing and oceanographic development."

NMU Pres. Joseph Curran said in his report to the convention that the union will expand the curriculum of its school for upgrading the skills of seamen who will take jobs in these fields.

The convention also approved a proposal to expand activities in the union's Panama Canal and other maritime-related divisions.

Midway in the four-day sessions, the delegates voted 460 to 8 against a proposal that would have required functional separation of union divisions, with none but deepsea members permitted to vote on officers or general union policies. Curran took the floor to oppose the proposal as a "union-wrecking" move.

The convention acted also to strengthen the NMU's political action program on ship and shore. A special education program on political and legislative issues will be undertaken through full-time political action chairmen, it was agreed.

Convention speakers predicted eventual success in a long battle for legislation providing Coast Guard supervision of diesel-powered river towboats. A full-scale program to reach that objective was adopted.

A convention resolution declared "the fact that neither the Coast Guard nor any other agency has the power to assure the safety of these boats and the competence of their personnel has brought great and repeated tragedy to communities along our rivers."

It is "criminal," the statement said, "to allow these huge bargeloads and other dangerous cargo to be carried on unsupervised craft."

The convention's 474 delegates represented about 55,000 members who sail all types of vessels and man installations in the Canal Zone, Puerto Rico and other areas.

No guest speakers were scheduled for convention sessions. The convention banquet was attended by guests including U.S. Maritime Administrator Andrew E. Gibson and Mrs. Helen D. Bentley, new chairman of the Federal Maritime Commission.

Bay State Convention Re-Elects Top Officers

Boston—The Massachusetts AFL-CIO made more progress in the legislative and service-to-member fields in the last two years than in any similar period since its founding, officers reported to the 12th annual convention.

All four executive officers were returned for two-year terms. Victorious over challengers were Pres. Salvatore Camelio and Sec.-Treas. James P. Loughlin. Re-elected without opposition were Executive Vice Presidents Daniel F. Murray and Joseph A. Sullivan.

All but one of 31 vice presidents won a new term of office. Gil Ferreira of the Clothing Workers, Fall River, replaced Ralph Roberts, who ran unsuccessfully for president.

The officers were authorized by the convention to fight a proposed increase in auto liability insurance rates at a hearing Nov. 7 before the state insurance commissioner here. Massachusetts rates are already among the highest in the nation, the convention noted.

The delegates agreed to call on their senators and representatives to lobby for relief against unfair foreign imports. Jobs have been lost and others are in danger because of a flood of shoes, textiles and computer parts produced in low-wage countries and sold at U.S. prices, the convention charged.

The delegates strongly applauded Sen. Edward Brooke (R-Mass.) for a speech condemning the Administration's choice of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., for a Supreme Court vacancy.

AFL-CIO COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan commended the state body for helping elect Rep. Michael J. Harrington (D) to Congress in a strongly contested campaign to fill the 6th District vacancy.

Pres. Thomas F. Policastro of the Rhode Island AFL-CIO, who heads the New England AFL-CIO Council, cited the economic improvement of the six-state area in recent years but warned that it faces three major problems. He listed them as the outmoded "fee for service" health care system, the growing influx of foreign-made goods, and the Administration's approach to plans to solve the nation's social, economic and educational needs.

Other speakers included Bayard Rustin of the A. Philip Randolph Institute; Stanton Smith, coordinator of AFL-CIO state and city central bodies; State Senate Pres. Maurice A. Donohue; House Speaker David M. Bartley; Clothing Workers Vice Pres. Joseph Salerno, and Gov. Frank Sargent (R).

agement from negotiating shorter maximum hours.

"Shorter hours of service and time on duty of employes for lesser periods of time are hereby declared to be proper subjects for collective bargaining," the House bill reads.

Similar legislation is before a Senate Commerce subcommittee.

The Senate gave a vote of confidence to the government's anti-poverty program, extending the authorization for the Office of Economic Opportunity and the multitude of programs it finances for another two years.

The amount authorized for the current fiscal year is the $2.5 billion requested in the President's budget. The Senate boosted the amount to $2.73 billion for the year starting next July 1. At the same time, it gave the OEO more leeway in shuffling funds from one program to another.

Over liberal opposition, the Senate voted 45-40 to amend the anti-poverty legislation to give the governor of a state absolute power to veto OEO legal services for the poor in his state. Under present law, the director of OEO can override a gubernatorial veto.

The amendment was pushed by Sen. George Murphy (R-Calif.) and it reflects the feud California's conservative Republican Gov. Ronald Reagan has had with the OEO-funded California Rural Legal Assistance agency.

In addition to individual help to poor families, the anti-poverty legal aid group has successfully sued to prevent Reagan from cutting the state's Medicaid program and it has gone to court in an effort to prevent the importation of strike-breakers from Mexico.

Final passage of the anti-poverty bill was by a 73-3 vote, with the only opposition coming from Senators Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.), Edward J. Gurney (R-Fla.) and James B. Allen (D-Ala.).

The House Ways & Means Committee, in a tentative vote, approved an extension of unemployment insurance coverage which was smaller than that sought by the Administration and far below the level urged by the AFL-CIO.

The committee went along with an Administration proposal for extension of unemployment benefits an additional 13 weeks during periods of high unemployment—defined as a jobless rate of at least 4.5 percent for three months. But it took no action on labor's major request for federal standards on the amount of benefits.

On coverage, the committee voted to include workers in small establishments now exempt, employes of nonprofit organizations, workers in state hospitals and colleges, and some 200,000 agricultural processing workers.

Its proposals would take in some 4 million of the 12 million workers now exempt, as compared with the 5.3 million sought by the Administration. The AFL-CIO had urged the committee to include "all wage and salary workers."

The committee took no action—for the present, at least—on the Administration's request for coverage of some 400,000 farm workers on large farms.

It proposed to raise the taxable wage base gradually to $4,800, up from the $3,000 in effect in most states. The Administration bill would have pushed it up to $6,000.

The Senate Finance Committee plodded along on its markup of the tax reform bill, weakening loophole-closing provisions passed by the House in some areas, tightening them in a few places.

The bill is expected to reach the Senate floor sometime next month where—unlike the House no-amendment procedure on tax bills—it will be subject to unlimited amendment.

With lobbyists for special interest groups actively pressing for wider loopholes, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller urged that there be no falloff in tax reform mail. He wrote officers of AFL-CIO state central bodies that "it is essential that senators hear from our members demanding tax justice."

A. S. Reile Dies, AFL-CIO Staffer

Honolulu—A. S. Reile, 65, a veteran union leader and AFL-CIO field representative in Hawaii, died Oct. 10 of an apparent heart attack. Funeral services were held Oct. 12 at the Central Union Church in Honolulu.

Reile held a variety of offices in Iron Workers Local 625 over the past 28 years, served as secretary-treasurer of the Honolulu Central Labor Council from 1949 to 1953, and since as the representative of the AFL and later the AFL-CIO.

In a message to Reile's widow, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany praised his service to his fellow workers "in many capacities and always with a deep dedication to brotherhood—the keystone of the labor movement."

AT HOUSE HEARINGS on occupational safety and health legislation, labor witnesses testified to the need for strong, federal standards. Waiting for the hearing to start, Pres. I. W. Abel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., left, and AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, center, discuss the bill with Labor Committee Chairman Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.).

'How About Some Help?'

Labor Bids Congress Act on Job Safety Bill

he said. "Safety and health rules should be applied with equal force without regard to state boundary lines."

Biemiller presented to the subcommittee the resolution unanimously passed at the AFL-CIO's convention this month supporting the O'Hara bill as "the first decisive step" towards the objective of "a safe and healthy place of employment for every American working man and woman."

He praised Pres. Nixon's message to Congress, stressing the need for federal legislation, and said that the issue "is no longer whether or not there should be any federal occupational safety and health legislation, but what kind of legislation should be enacted."

Explaining why the AFL-CIO supports the O'Hara bill in preference to the Administration bill sponsored by Rep. William H. Ayres (R-Ohio), Biemiller cited these key differences:

The O'Hara bill directs the Secretary of Labor to issue on-the-job safety and health standards, and to enforce the law with power to shut down an unsafe operation in an emergency. Health standards would be based on recommendations developed by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

The Administration bill would establish a new five-member National Occupational Safety & Health Board, appointed by the President. "Instead of providing a single focus for attacking the safety and health problems of the American workplace," Biemiller said, "it would constitute another layer of bureaucracy."

The bill, he added, "mixes up responsibilities . . . like a mess of spaghetti" between the proposed board, the Labor Dept. and HEW.

Furthermore, Biemiller noted, the Administration bill in practical effect would rely on private standard-setting organizations such as the National Standards Institute and the National Fire Protection Association to develop the federal codes.

Such groups have made "important contributions," Biemiller said, and the AFL-CIO has cooperated with them. But they tend to be dominated by management, and various standard-setting committees "move with glacial slowness" in trying to reach a consensus.

Federal legislation should also cover the federal government's own workers and public employes generally, Biemiller urged. To cover all American workers equally is "a matter of morality," he told the subcommittee.

Pres. Johnson proposed major federal job safety and health legislation in 1968 and a compromise bill was approved by the House Education & Labor Committee, but it died with the end of the 90th Congress without ever coming to a vote.

A companion bill to the O'Hara legislation has been introduced in the Senate by Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.).

Service Union Wins Election For 9,500

Los Angeles—Two local unions of the Service Employes won the right to represent 9,500 county employes in elections conducted by the Los Angeles County Employe Relations Commission.

The commission certified SEIU Local 434 as the legal bargaining representative of two units. One covers 4,530 county hospital paramedical employes including licensed visiting nurses and attendants, technicians and therapists, ambulance and laboratory personnel.

The other unit has 3,000 workers including cooks, bakers, food service workers, waitresses, laundry personnel, pharmacy helpers, institutional laborers and helpers, seamstresses, autopsy and darkroom employes.

A third group of 2,009 workers includes custodians and other employes of the county Building Services Dept. They voted for representation by Local 434 and newly established SEIU Local 601, which will share bargaining obligations.

The Employe Relations Commission certified these results: in Unit 1, the vote was 2,883 for the union, 117 for other choices; Unit 2, with 1,281 voting, all but 64 chose the union; Unit 3, all but 117 of the 1,525 voting cast ballots for SEIU.

The overall result was that with 7,053 employes voting, nearly 80 percent favored union representation, the locals reported to SEIU Pres. David Sullivan.

Congressmen Join Fight On Auto Pollution Deal

Forty-six congressmen have joined in a petition urging a federal district judge to reject a deal between the Justice Dept. and the nation's auto manufacturers that would suppress evidence of a 16-year conspiracy to squelch pollution control devices.

The AFL-CIO convention earlier had wired its opposition to the proposed "consent agreement" to U.S. District Judge Jesse W. Curtis in Los Angeles.

Judge Curtis had invited interested parties to give their views before he ruled on whether to permit the Justice Dept. to drop its antitrust conspiracy case.

A federal grand jury, which indicted the Big Four auto manufacturers, said the firms had conspired to delay research, testing, development and installation of effective air pollution control equipment.

The indictments had been obtained under the Johnson Administration and the consent order—which would eliminate a trial or any penalty against the auto firms—was negotiated by the present Administration.

A consent agreement amounts to a promise to sin no more, without specifically admitting any past guilt.

Its effect would be to seal off the evidence obtained by the grand jury and make it almost impossible for cities or individuals to win civil damage claims based on smog and pollution from motor vehicles.

Rep. Edward R. Roybal (D-Calif.), who organized the bipartisan congressional intervention in the case, said that Los Angeles County and the cities of New York and Chicago have already filed civil suits seeking damages from the auto firms.

Roybal said "it is essential that this behind-the-scenes offer to settle be summarily rejected by the court, as not being in the best interest of the American consumer" and that an "open trial" be held to determine whether the manufacturers are guilty.

If they did suppress development of pollution control devices as charged, Roybal said, the public is entitled to redress since "we know that deadly car exhaust fumes cause more than 50 percent of America's total air pollution." He cited medical evidence of pollution as the cause of serious illness and death, and estimates of billions of dollars in property damage.

Project Build Places 40 in Skilled Crafts

The majority of recent graduates in a labor-sponsored training program in Washington, D.C., have entered higher-skilled building and construction trades as apprentices.

Roland J. Williams, executive director of Project Build, reported that 40 of 59 recent graduates are now building trades apprentices and another 18 are in holding jobs pending completion of requirements for apprenticeship.

A breakdown of the apprenticeship placements shows eight with Bricklayers Local 4; eight with Painters District Council 51; five with International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 26; four with Roofers Local 891; two each with Operating Engineers, Elevator Constructors and the Reinforced Rodmen, and 18 with Laborers Local 74.

Project Build is sponsored by the Greater Washington Central Labor Council and Washington Building & Construction Trades Council.

At Inter-American Conference:

Meany Bids Labor Ministers Support Rights of Workers

Pres. Nixon emphasized that "the development of all our resources is imperative if we are to attain our goals for a better life. But first among these is the human resource."

Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz headed the American delegation. Major conference speakers in addition to Meany and Shultz, included OAS Sec.-Gen. Galo Plaza; David A. Morse, director-general of the International Labor Organization, and Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.).

Meany told the conference that the AFL-CIO "has devoted considerable effort to raise the standard of life in other parts of the world." especially in Latin America.

Much of the effort, he pointed out, has been made in cooperation with business and government through the American Institute for Free Labor Development established in 1962 "to provide educational and development assistance obviously needed and directly sought by free trade unions in Latin America and the Caribbean."

"The AFL-CIO, through AIFLD," Meany said, "has offered trade union courses to thousands of your trade unionists both in Latin America and in the United States."

In addition, he said, "we have assisted in the construction of worker housing, worker credit institutions, worker cooperatives, clinics and even schools for children in many of your countries."

Meany also cited U.S. labor's work with national trade union centers and the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT) as part of a "proud record of association" with free trade unions in the hemisphere.

The AFL-CIO engages in international programs for two reasons, Meany said: To help free workers achieve economic and social advancement and prevent "dictatorships of the left or right, communist or fascist."

Labor knows, he went on, that dictatorship anywhere is "accompanied by destruction of free unions" and "represents a threat to freedom everywhere in the world."

Meany leveled sharp criticisms at union movements that turn to military governments on their promises of quick improvements in working conditions.

Such situations, he said, only add to workers' discontent and suffering and "help to perpetuate intolerable conditions of misery, poverty and social unrest."

Shultz challenged the labor ministers to play a vital role in the "effort for economic growth and development" and shoulder major responsibility "in seeking social justice." He said:

"We should lead in developing the best means for incorporating manpower policy in the overall strategy of economic development.

"We should work to provide a fuller understanding of the anatomy and meaning of unemployment and poverty, especially to those most directly affected."

And, he added, the labor ministers have "particular responsibility" to seek solutions to problems of development so as "not to place the greater burden on the weakest and most disadvantaged members of society."

The urgency of resolving increasing unemployment in Western Hemisphere nations was emphasized by Plaza.

"At least 25 percent of the Latin American labor force was unemployed in 1960," the OAS leader stated, "and the figure today is believed to be even higher. The vast majority of Latin Americans live close to the margin of subsistence, with little opportunity to improve their lot."

If prevailing trends continue, he warned, "the gap between the rich and the poor will grow even greater."

Plaza deplored the "extremely low rate" of participation of Latin American women in the labor force, pointing out that those who do work often are compelled to choose between domestic and other low-productivity positions or no job at all.

Morse told the conference that policies to bring about the "most significant and most rapid possible increase in employment" should be the cornerstone of future development of the Americas.

He implored the ministers to develop plans for a distribution of income that will allow more of their rapidly growing populations to participate and benefit from economic growth "within the next few years, not in some distant future."

Morse also unveiled a plaque at the Pan American Union in Washington commemorating the 50th anniversary of the first session of the ILO. The ceremonies were attended by the ministers and members of their delegations.

IUOE Training Project Places 26 Graduates

Anaconda, Mont.—The Operating Engineers have placed 26 young men in meaningful occupations after their graduation from the heavy equipment training program the union conducts here with the Job Corps.

The program is expected to graduate and place in jobs five to six Job Corpsmen a month as the operations of the center continue under a Labor Dept. contract said Project Dir. Jim Robertson of Operating Engineers Local 400.

About 60 Corpsmen are enrolled at one time, most being members of the minority groups. They receive instruction and on-the-job training in the operation of more than 40 kinds of heavy construction equipment and vehicles.

A number of the students with low educational skills are also upgraded in reading and mathematics as a regular part of the training program.

Almost all the training entails road building in mountainous terrain for the U.S. Forest Service. Drilling, servicing and mechanics also are taught in the one-year training courses.

GE Tactics Denounced As Threat to Settlement

New York—The failure of General Electric Co. to engage in meaningful collective bargaining is seriously endangering the chances of a peaceful contract settlement, Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers warned here.

Jennings reported that representatives of IUE local unions at 65 GE locations, representing the IUE-GE Conference Board, rejected management's latest offer as "totally unacceptable."

Many local unions have taken strike votes, and others are scheduled, Jennings noted. Other unions with representatives on IUE's negotiating committee "share our lack of enthusiasm and also have rejected the company's position," he said.

With less than two weeks remaining before expiration of the IUE contract with GE, he declared "it would seem that much time remains for earnest negotiation. However, recent management statements and GE's history of unlawful non-bargaining are danger signals indicating the possibility that GE's offer may be on a take-it-or-leave-it basis."

Jennings recalled that in past negotiations "management locked itself into a rigid posture out of fear that the company would lose faith if it improved an offer after saying it would not."

"We sincerely hope that is not the case at present," he stressed.

He said that reports from local union leaders show that members are "shocked and angered" at the company's inadequate offer, and resentful of the fact that management released its proposal publicly before presenting it to the union negotiating committee.

Jennings said the union is prepared to bargain in good faith, adding: "We are flexible, but we are determined to achieve a settlement that will be fair to our members who have lost every penny of the 12.9 percent increases in the last agreement" because of rising prices.

"GE's offer would have its employes pay the fuel bill for an inflation they did not create," he declared.

His statement said GE has just announced that its profits for 1969's third quarter "rose by another 11 percent." This "remarkably affluent corporation can afford a settlement in tune with agreements in comparable industries—a settlement that provides protection against future cost-of-living increases," Jennings declared.

A union analysis put GE's offer at the 6 percent level for the average GE employe. That means, it said, that "GE proposes to restore only half of what its workers have lost during the present agreement."

Labor-Backed Social Security Bill Calls for Two 20 Percent Boosts

12 percent and 14 percent in three steps between Jan. 1, 1970, and Jan. 1, 1974.

His revised bill, he added, will call for increasing the minimum social security benefit from its present level of $55 a month to $90 in January 1970 and $120 in January 1972.

The earlier bill would have raised the minimum to $103 by January 1974 over a three-step process beginning in 1970.

Gilbert's new bill also would do away with the requirement that men who retire at 62 must compute their average earnings by including years up to 65. Elimination of the requirement would increase retirement benefits considerably for men who retire early. Women who retire at 62 already have their earnings figure computed to that age.

In other major areas, the new bill will be identical to the previous one, Gilbert said.

For the first time there would be cost-of-living protection under social security. The medical insurance part of Medicare, now paid for partly by the retiree, would be financed through contributions paid during the beneficiary's working years. The basic Medicare plan would be expanded to cover prescription drugs. The entire program would be extended to include persons receiving disability benefits under social security.

There also would be improvements in widows' benefits, an increase in lump sum death benefits, an increase in the taxable earnings ceiling from $7,800 to $15,000 by 1972, and a provision to bring the government in on financing until the federal contribution is one-third in 1980, matching the employer and worker contributions.

AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman praised Gilbert for adjusting his bill to reflect the brightened financial picture.

"Your new bill conforms 100 percent with the improvements in social security called for by the recent AFL-CIO convention," Seidman said. "You will have the enthusiastic support of the entire AFL-CIO."

Pres. Nelson H. Cruikshank of the National Council of Senior Citizens pledged his organization to an "all-across the nation effort" to secure passage of Gilbert's bill. Members of the council's board attended the press conference and also promised support.

"We're not tired, we're just retired, and we mean to go out and battle for this legislation," Cruikshank said.

In another development, Sec. Robert H. Finch of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare ran into heavy fire as he presented opening testimony before the House Ways & Means Committee in support of the Administration's request for a 10 percent increase in social security benefits.

Democrats on the committee, who have called for a much greater increase, were angered because Finch could not stay for immediate questioning after outlining the Administration's proposal in a prepared statement. Finch, who promised to return for questioning next week, asked to be excused so that he might fulfill a campaign commitment in California.

House Defies Threat of Veto On Postal Pay days, but there would be no retroactivity.

The bill would boost postal pay by advancing postal workers two in-grade pay levels, effective Oct. 1. It also cuts the waiting period for advancement to higher in-grade pay steps from one year to six months for rank-and-file postal workers and from three years to one year for those in the higher grades.

Rep. Morris K. Udall (D-Ariz.), who steered the bill through the House, said the pay raise for postal workers is justified because "the vast majority" remain in the same grade level throughout their career and have little opportunity for promotion.

He and other congressmen said the shortening of the period required to reach the top level of the pay grade is long overdue because it now takes 21 years—in effect, a 20-year "apprenticeship." The House bill would compress the period between starting and final salary to eight years.

Tax Justice Drive Pressed To Halt 'Big Steal' in Senate

New Outpouring Of Letters Urged

By David L. Perlman

Tax reform legislation is being cut to ribbons in the Senate at the instigation of "an army of special interest lobbyists," the AFL-CIO charged.

The American people must make their demand for tax justice heard above "the din of the loophole lobby," Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said in an urgent message to the AFL-CIO's state and local central bodies.

He called for an outpouring of mail to senators "to stop the big tax steal of 1969," comparable to the public pressure for tax justice that was "heard so clearly earlier this year when the bill was in the House of Representatives."

The AFL-CIO warning came as the Senate Finance Committee continued to hack away at the House-passed tax reform bill—itself a compromise measure considerably short of the comprehensive loophole-closing legislation that has been urged by the AFL-CIO.

In its actions to date, the Senate committee has restored hundreds of millions of dollars in loopholes for corporations, banks and wealthy individuals — far overbalancing a few areas of improvement on the House bill.

The business lobbyists who have descended on the Senate are "intent on preserving existing tax loopholes and carving out new ones for their clients at the expense of other taxpayers," Biemiller reported.

"Like a plague of locusts," he said, "this mass lobby has devoured almost every loophole-closing section of the House tax reform measure."

The Senate Finance Committee has not yet finished its work on the loophole-closing sections of the tax bill—and has not yet begun action

Meany Hits GE, Warns On Deadline

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called on the General Electric Co. to abandon its "19th Century approach" to labor relations and to offer its unions "a realistic proposal that would lead to a reasonable settlement" without a strike.

"There is almost no time left for negotiations," Meany said in a statement rebuking GE for having made "one woefully weak, totally unacceptable offer" to 10 AFL-CIO unions representing nearly 200,000 GE employes.

"GE can still avoid a strike by doing the right thing—by making a realistic proposal" before union contracts run out at midnight Oct. 26, said Meany, who is chairman of the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee for GE and Westinghouse.

Earlier the coordinated unions withdrew some proposals and modified others in New York City in an attempt to galvanize bargaining. But GE refused to move, calling the counter-proposals a "bargaining

Reaffirms Opposition:

Labor Scores Nixon On Haynsworth Bid

The AFL-CIO considers Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., "not fit to be on the Supreme Court" and nothing that Pres. Nixon has said in defense of his nominee has changed that belief, Federation Pres. George Meany declared.

Meany suggested that "the President has been misled by the Justice Dept. about his nominee." He charged that the Administration has steadily lowered its judicial ethics standards as the conflict of interest evidence against Haynsworth has mounted.

As for the President's accusation that critics of the Haynsworth nomination had engaged in "vicious character assassination" against the South Carolina judge, Meany responded:

"Both personally and on behalf of the AFL-CIO, I resent this charge. It is unwarranted and false."

It is also a slur, Meany noted, upon the integrity of leading Republican as well as Democratic senators who have spoken out against the nomination and urged the President to withdraw it.

Nixon said at his press conference that he won't withdraw the nomination even if Haynsworth requests him to do so. He defended the judge's integrity and said that it would not be "proper" for senators to vote against confirmation because they disagree with Haynsworth's "philosophy" on civil rights and labor law.

"If Judge Haynsworth's philosophy leans to the conservative side," the President said, "that recommends him to me."

The White House news conference was the latest in a series of Administration efforts to stem the erosion of Republican support for the nomination. About a dozen Republican senators are reported opposed to Haynsworth, with a number of others uncommitted, and

Houses Rise Above Rubble Of Hurricane

Empire, La.—Rising above the rubble of Hurricane Camille in the Louisiana delta and bayou country are scores of new homes.

They are a part of the 90 houses that will be erected by the State AFL-CIO volunteers who plan to work on six weekends extending well into November. In all, 6,000 members of Louisiana unions will participate in the project to aid the hurricane victims.

After the first 1,000 volunteers poured into the ravaged areas in mid-October, 15 new homes were completed from the ground up in a two-day weekend.

ILO Awarded Nobel Prize For Peace Role

The International Labor Organization has been awarded the 1969 Nobel Peace Prize for 50 years of helping to safeguard peace through the promotion of social justice.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany praised the selection as "a tribute to the foresight and vision" of Samuel Gompers, who was chairman of a commission at the 1919 Paris Peace Conference out of which came the ILO.

Meany, ILO Dir.-Gen. David A. Morse and Rudolph Faupl, U.S. worker delegate to the organization, also viewed the award as a tribute to workers themselves.

Labor Law Change Clears Way For Scholarship, Day Care Funds

It's now legal for employers to contribute to union-management day care centers and college scholarship programs for workers' children.

Pres. Nixon has signed into law a labor-backed amendment to the Taft-Hartley Act that won near-unanimous approval from both the House and Senate.

The legislation had been sought particularly by the Clothing Workers and the Ladies' Garment Workers, which had found themselves stymied in negotiations by a rigid interpretation of a Taft-Hartley provision limiting the uses of employer contributions to jointly-administered welfare funds.

The law change had the AFL-CIO's active support during a two-year effort to win congressional approval. A House-passed bill died in the Senate with the close of the 90th Congress and the legislative effort had to start anew this year.

The new legislation does not require an employer to bargain on child care or scholarship contributions, and it would not be an unfair labor practice for him to refuse to do so.

But if these benefits are negotiated, company funds may be used to finance the programs.

One immediate effect is to free funds intended for a scholarship program for children of 130,000 members of the Clothing Workers. The ACWA last year negotiated an agreement with the Clothing Manufacturers Association for the payment of one-half of 1 percent of payroll into a trust fund.

As an example of the type of programs the law change would encourage, the Clothing Workers told the Senate Labor Committee earlier this year that the union is operat-

Medicare Doctors' Bills Seen Forcing Fee Hike

The Administration revealed that it plans to raise the $4 monthly charge levied for coverage of doctors' services under Medicare by more than 25 percent because of soaring doctors' bills.

Social Security Administrator Robert M. Ball told the House Ways & Means Committee that a final decision on the amount of the increase still has to be made but that the boost will put the charge "somewhat over $5."

Ball told the committee, holding hearings on pending social security legislation, that the higher charge will be effective July 1. Under the law, the Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare must decide on the raise by Jan. 1.

This would be the second boost in the fee paid by the aged under the medical insurance part of Medicare, which is also partly financed by the government.

When the program was first set up in 1966 the fee was $3. It was raised to $4 in 1968.

Ball also announced that the Administration is still reviewing a task force study recommending that drug costs be included under Medicare. "If we move in," he said, "it will be gradually."

Ball's announcements came under questioning from Rep. Jacob H. Gilbert (D-N.Y.), who has charged that the Administration's proposed 10 percent increase in social security benefits is "grossly inadequate."

Gilbert has introduced a bill, backed by the AFL-CIO, the National Council of Senior Citizens and a number of other organizations, which would provide for two 20 percent across-the-board increases in benefits between 1970 and 1972.

The measure also would finance the medical insurance program through contributions paid during the beneficiary's working years and expand Medicare to cover prescription drugs.

In another development, the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare published two new proposed regulations for Medicare in the Federal Register, Oct. 17.

One would prohibit hospitals and extended care facilities from requiring a deposit from Medicare beneficiaries as a condition for admission. The other would bar a doctor with financial interest in a hospital from sitting on its review committee which determines when Medicare patients are to be discharged.

The first regulation, particularly of benefit to the aged poor, spells out in detail a policy announced by HEW in May, 1967, but not previously defined.

The regulation states that health facilities may not deny admission or evict a Medicare beneficiary because he is unable to pay a deductible amount (the first $44 of the hospital bill, for example) or certain per-day amounts required after extended stays—60 days in the case of a hospital, 20 days in an extended care facility.

Advance payments for services not covered by Medicare may be required, but only if such services are requested by the patient or his family.

Metropolitan Opera Soloists Achieve Pact

New York—One of three unions negotiating with the Metropolitan Opera reached tentative agreement on terms covering 150 solo artists while negotiations continued on contracts affecting several hundred other employes — chorus, ballet, musicians, stage and service employes.

The American Guild of Musical Artists said the settlement for the solo artists is being reduced to contract language. Other negotiations are continuing with the help of the presidents of the unions involved and Pres. Harry Van Arsdale of the New York City Central Labor Council, who entered the talks at the request of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

The Musical Artists said they hope their accord will lead to agreements covering all other Met employes. Proposals had been made by the unions last spring and negotiations continued off and on until management locked out the employes Sept. 15, the day the opera's new season was to begin.

The solo artists are one of three Met groups for whom the Actors & Artistes of America and its branches bargain. Their new contract provisions include raises from $200 a week to $265 in starting pay, $275 in the second year, $280 in the third, with base pay of $300 to $375 a week for experienced soloists. Improved working conditions and a reduction in hours also are part of the settlement, Executive Sec. Hyman R. Faine said.

Change in Law Permits Talks On Joint Funds

ing a day care center in Baltimore —but to avoid violating the letter of the Taft-Hartley Act, it has had to set it up as a health care center.

And in Chicago, they noted, the union has an "experimental" program which provides $600-a-year tuition at colleges or technical schools for children of longtime members.

The Ladies' Garment Workers told the Senate committee that lack of day care centers in the women's apparel industry, where about 80 percent of the workers are women, has resulted in a high employment turnover rate.

The union said many women are forced to quit their jobs and stay home to take care of young children because there are no adequate child care facilities.

The AFL-CIO told Congress that the "severely restrictive" language of the Taft-Hartley Act is preventing the private sector of the economy from carrying out programs to benefit the country "without cost to the taxpayer."

Paperworkers Beat Off Raid By Teamsters

Albany, N.Y.—The Papermakers & Paperworkers repelled a Teamster raid attempt in National Labor Relations Board elections at Westvaco Corp. plants in Covington, Va., Luke, Md. and Williamsburg, Pa.

With ballots cast by 3,235 of 3,567 eligible employes, the vote was 2,176 for UPP, 1,039 for the paper division of the expelled Teamsters. The NLRB reported 17 no union votes and three void ballots.

During the last 18 months, UPP defeated three other major raids by the Teamsters, which was expelled from the AFL-CIO in 1957 for domination by corrupt interests. The other Teamster defeats were in Mobile, Ala., Atlanta and Augusta, Ga.

UPP Pres. Harry D. Sayre called the election results "proof that workers in the paper industry want honest, decent, dedicated representation by a democratic union of their own industry."

Court Condemns Violations:

J. P. Stevens Rated 'Five-Time Loser'

New Orleans—J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., became a "five-time loser" when the U.S. Court of Appeals here found it guilty of "persistent, long-continued, flagrant violations" of the right of its employes to join collectively for their own protection.

It was the fifth time in a row that federal appeals judges had convicted the big government contractor of breaking the Taft-Hartley law in defiance of the National Labor Relations Board and the courts.

Judges of the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals enforced an NLRB finding that Stevens unlawfully fired four workers at its Dublin, Ga., plant to prevent employes from supporting the Textile Workers Union of America. The workers won back their jobs with full backpay and seniority.

Union Pres. William Pollock said of the corporation's fifth straight setback that "continued defiance of the National Labor Relations Act by Stevens has reached the proportions of a national disgrace."

The court action raises the total of illegally fired workers to 111 and of lost wages that Stevens must make up to more than $1 million. The total may rise further when two other charges against Stevens, still in the courts, are disposed of, TWUA noted.

Pollock said the strong language used in the 5th Circuit decision "demonstrates the growing impatience of the federal judiciary with J. P. Stevens." He cited these findings by Chief Judge John R. Brown and Judges Robert A. Ainsworth, Jr. and James A. Comiskey:

On law defiance: "Stevens has shown not once or twice . . . but five times that it will not abide by the demands of the law. . . . It now has five service stripes."

On management's "deep-seated antiunion convictions": Stevens engaged in a "massive multistate campaign to prevent unionization of its southern employes" by committing "numerous . . . unfair labor practices, coercive interrogation, surveillance, threats of plant closings and economic reprisals for union activity."

On the company's charge that the NLRB's "unabashed objective" is to aid the union in organizing Stevens workers: "This order may appear to be making the lot of the union easier. But it is being made easier solely because the employer has made that lot harder than the law tolerates."

In spite of the convictions and the pending charges, Stevens "continues to violate the law," Pollock noted. He charged also that it is "equally disgraceful" for the U.S. Dept. of Defense to keep on awarding multimillion-dollar contracts to Stevens—a practice that the union and the AFL-CIO have urged the Administration to change by executive order.

An outstanding feature of the latest decision was the assertion by the three appeals judges that the remedy for unfair labor practices laid down in Stevens II by the 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals in New York City, was "not stringent enough." The latter court had refused to permit non-employes of Stevens to distribute union handbills on company property.

The 5th Circuit judges summed the case up as follows:

"Only three things distinguish this case from the run-of-the-mill [unfair practice] cases.

"The first is the tenacity with which the employer persists in the exercise of deep seated anti-union convictions.

"The second is the succession of formal cases . . . in which, except for minor variations, the NLRB's findings of spectacular employer violation . . . of the Act have been upheld by three Courts of Appeals.

"The third is the board's effort to devise some . . . remedy which has at least some prospect of keeping the recalcitrant employer's intransigence within the bounds of vigorous but lawful opposition" to union organizing attempts.

The judges enforced the board's order against Stevens' unlawful threats and firings "in this atmosphere of persistent, flagrant violations occurring after, and in spite of, repeated declarations of illegality by the board and reviewing courts."

Stevens "apparently abandoned" its attack on NLRB findings of "classic, albeit crude, unlawful labor practices" and leveled a "full but unsuccessful broadside" against the special remedies devised by the NLRB to get Stevens to obey the law, the 5th Circuit said. It approved these board remedies:

- Requiring that a notice of the board order against Stevens be sent to each employe's home to let the employe see "that someone stronger than J.P. Stevens & Co. has a voice in protecting those who wish to support the union."
- Compelling the employer to read a notice to each employe that it will not again violate the law. The board is justified, the court said, in perceiving a "chill atmosphere of fear" and ordering the reading as an "effective but moderate way to let in a warming wind of information . . . and reassurance."
- Requiring Stevens to give the union reasonable access for one year to company bulletin boards.
- Forcing Stevens to make a list of employe names and addresses available to the union.

Robert T. Stevens, Secretary of the Army in the Eisenhower Administration, heads the Stevens textile empire. His company has been accused seven times of breaking the law to abort the TWUA union organizing campaign that started in 1963, and seven findings of unlawful conduct have been made against it.

The Supreme Court has let stand at least two of the orders against the corporation. Despite all the orders of the NLRB and the courts, not a single group of Stevens employes has been able to organize.

Meany Urges Full Support of Beef Boycott

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called on all affiliates and their members to refuse to buy the products of Iowa Beef Packers, Inc. The Meat Cutters have been engaged in a strike against the company since Aug. 24.

Meany said the firm was "known throughout the Midwest as a bitter foe of organized labor." He noted that "the workers are seeking wage rates and employment benefits prevalent in the meat packing industry."

Meany urged all union members to comply with the resolution unanimously adopted by the recent AFL-CIO convention, which pledged "complete support" to the strikers and called on all AFL-CIO members "to refuse to purchase" the company's products.

4 Times Nixon Proposal:

Senate Votes Boost In GI School Benefits

The Senate rejected a White House economy plea and voted unanimously to raise educational benefits for returning servicemen by $60 a month—four times the increase the President had recommended.

Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.), author of the original GI education bill, led the drive to raise payments for veterans attending school full time from $130 to $190 for single students. The rate would go from $155 to $213 a month for students with one dependent and from $175 to $240 for students with two dependents.

The House had voted a smaller increase—to $165 for single students, to $197 with one dependent, and to $222 for two dependents.

Even this was too high, Pres. Nixon said in a letter to Yarborough before the vote. He suggested a 10 to 15 percent increase —to about $145 a month for single students.

He termed the Senate bill "unrealistic and excessive." And in what was regarded as a veto threat, Nixon warned that he would view its enactment with "extreme concern."

But on the Senate floor, not a single senator proposed to cut the bill back to the Administration level.

A motion by Sen. John J. Williams (R-Del.) to reduce the increase to the House-passed level was beaten on a voice vote. The Senate then approved the Yarborough bill, 77-0.

Pending in the House, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, was a showdown vote on a major housing bill—and on an amendment that the AFL-CIO warned "would turn this pro-housing bill into an anti-labor measure." The basic measure would extend and expand current federal housing programs.

The federation and the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. had urged the House to defeat an attempt to give the Secretary of Housing & Urban Development power to overrule union contracts and work rules if he found that they inhibited cheaper construction techniques.

A similar amendment had been added in the Senate by voice vote with many senators absent at the time. The House Banking Committee knocked it out of the bill, but conservatives were preparing a major effort to put it back in as an amendment.

In earlier action on the housing measure, the House voted to lower the amount that low-income families have to pay under the rent supplement program.

Under present law, they pay 25 percent of their income and the government pays the rest. The House voted to lower the requirement to 20 percent of income.

In other congressional developments:

- A bill aimed at ending a bank boycott of federally-guaranteed student loans received final congressional approval.

Banks had refused to make loans at the present legal ceiling of 7 percent. The new legislation authorizes the government to pay an "incentive allowance" to banks equal to an additional 3 percent interest. Thus the banks will earn a 10 percent rate on the student loans they make, but the students will only have to pay the 7 percent rate.

- Prospects for limited draft reform legislation appeared bright as the House Armed Services Committee voted 31-0 approval of the Administration's proposal to draft 19-year-olds first through a "lottery" system of random selection. The lottery selection system is specifically prohibited by existing law.

- The Senate Banking Committee approved a bill to make available an additional $3 billion for home mortgages—over the opposition of the Administration. It would raise from $1 billion to $4 billion the amount the Federal Home Loan Bank Board could borrow from the Treasury to lend to savings institutions for mortgage loans during periods of tight money. Treasury officials argued that such borrowing would add to the government's fiscal problems.

OEO Mobile Unit Used to Train Mexican Employes of Runaways

A government-financed unit designed to help eliminate poverty in the United States is being used to aid runaway plants in Mexico which labor contends are increasing poverty among American workers.

That is the meaning that comes from an announcement made by the U.S.-Mexico Commission for Border Development & Friendship (CODAF) and stories carried by Mexican newspapers.

The agency reports in a recent issue of its newsletter that a job-training unit, the property of the Office of Economic Opportunity, is being used at a center in Mexicali, Mexico.

The mobile training unit was loaned to the center by OEO, which by law is supposed to use its funds and equipment to provide training for unemployed Americans.

Mexican newspapers have carried pictures of the training unit and articles about its sophisticated equipment that includes audio-visual aids, tools and work areas.

The unit is specifically set up to train workers in electronics, presumably to equip them to work in Litton Industries, RCA-Whirlpool, Fairchild Camera, Transitron, and lesser-known U.S. electronics firms that have crossed the border to take advantage of cheap labor.

The electronics firms, and other companies ranging from textiles to furniture, are fleeing to Mexico to operate under the Mexican national frontier program (PRONAF), supported by the United States and Mexican governments.

The program enables the firms to employ Mexican workers—for as little as 30 cents an hour—in assembling goods for shipment back into the United States.

None of the items can be sold in Mexico. U.S. tariff concessions give the runaway firms still another advantage. Yet, as labor unions have pointed out, the American consumer gets no price reduction—the only gainer is the industry that fattens its profits.

A resolution adopted by the recent AFL-CIO convention charged that the program is "exporting" jobs from a U.S. area along the border where the jobless rate is running as high as 9 percent and thousands of families live in poverty on incomes of less than $2,000 a year.

Further, the resolution emphasized, some of the "exported jobs" are adding to unemployment in more distant parts of the nation, where there is an "urgent need" to maintain jobs and job opportunities.

The resolution called for repeal of a section of the U.S. Tariff Code which provides low tariffs on "value added" goods and also urged Congress to probe the use of federal manpower training and anti-poverty funds in connection with the program.

CODAF, which boasts that it arranged for the "donation" of the OEO mobile unit, was set up two years ago. Although it has no official status, its U.S. section is headed by Assistant Sec. of State Charles Meyer and includes other government officials.

Congress previously ended a "back door" practice under which government agencies were funding CODAF out of their own budgets without government authorization.

As a result, Meyer went before Congress last month to seek legislative authority for the organization to remain in existence. His request is still pending.

ILO Wins Nobel Prize For 50-Year Peace Role

The Nobel Prize Committee, announcing its decision in Oslo, Norway, after considering 45 candidates, described the ILO as an organization that has worked continuously to improve workers' social conditions, "thus contributing to safeguarding world peace."

Mrs. Aase Lionaess, chairman of the committee, said that the prize—$75,000 plus an insignia, a diploma and a gold medal—will be awarded to an ILO representative at Oslo University on Dec. 10.

That day is the anniversary of the death of Alfred Nobel, the Swedish inventor. The Nobel awards were set up at his bequest.

Although the prize was originally designated to go to individuals "who shall have done the most or the best work for peace," a number of organizations have received the award in recent years. Past recipients include the International Red Cross and UNICEF—the United Nation's Children's Fund.

Mrs. Lionaess said that the committee's choice of the ILO "stresses the close relations between work, social progress and peace."

She cited the organization's activities in "reducing social barriers between people in an effort to make nations work together in peace" and its efforts to reduce unemployment and improve working conditions.

Meany pointed out that Gompers—"the father of the ILO"—believed that "improving the conditions of workers everywhere could make an important contribution to peace and justice."

Noting that the organization was founded 50 years ago this month in Washington "with Gompers in the chair," he added: "It is an award, therefore, that has special significance to workers throughout the world."

Morse called the award to the ILO "a tribute to the common man throughout the world."

The award, he added, "will give the ILO immense encouragement to build further on the solid foundation laid by unremitting efforts to which the governments, employers and workers throughout the world have contributed in full measure."

Faupl, a Machinists' representative who has served as the U.S. worker delegate since 1958 said:

"There can be no peace without social justice—this has been the overriding conviction of the ILO since its beginning and this is the basis for its future."

GE Snubs New Offers As Deadline Approaches

table ploy" that changes nothing.

Meany reported that GE had made one contract offer "in response to the carefully documented case made by the unions for a reasonable, realistic collective bargaining agreement with a 1969-model wage level."

GE not only has not changed its proposal but has "barely listened to the unions' revised proposal," the AFL-CIO president said.

Charging that GE has "made a mockery of the word negotiate," Meany warned that "time will soon run out. At midnight Oct. 26—next Sunday—GE's workers will either have a new, acceptable contract or there will be a strike."

Meany emphasized: "I hope there won't be a strike. I hope GE will negotiate, even at this late date.

"But if GE forces the workers to strike, as it seems determined to do, I want General Electric management, stockholders and customers to know this:

"The GE strikers will have every bit of support they need from the entire AFL-CIO until the hour of victory."

At the bargaining table the coordinated unions withdrew their proposals for a 37.5-hour week and other fringe benefits, but left on the table requests for substantial wage hikes and cost-of-living adjustments.

Members of the CBC are the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Steelworkers, Carpenters, Technical Engineers, Plumbers, Flint Glass Workers, Machinists, Allied Industrial Workers and Sheet Metal Workers.

General Electric has offered a pay hike of 20 cents an hour; an additional 5 to 25 cents for skilled workers, and wage reopeners in two succeeding years. The union bargainers turned the proposal down as failing to meet the real needs of GE workers.

Formal negotiations between GE and the AFL-CIO unions began in August after three months of subcommittee meetings between GE management and IUE, representing 90,000 GE employes, plus representatives of another 50,000 workers who sit on the IUE committee but bargain basically for their own members.

The system, called coordinated bargaining, has been sanctioned by the courts over management objections.

The Fight for Tax Justice

LABOR'S DRIVE to achieve tax justice in 1969 is in serious jeopardy.

An army of special interest lobbyists—intent on preserving existing tax loopholes and carving out new ones for their clients at the expense of other taxpayers—has descended upon the Senate.

Like a plague of locusts, this mass lobby has devoured almost every loophole-closing section of the House tax reform measure. Led by the Administration, which seeks to preserve tax loopholes and give tax relief to corporations rather than middle-income America, these enemies of tax justice have cut the bill to ribbons in the Senate Finance Committee.

We must act immediately if we are to stop the big tax steal of 1969.

Today labor stands virtually alone in the fight for tax justice for millions of low-and middle-income Americans.

The senators, many of them favorable to tax reform, are being besieged. They need to hear the voices of Americans demanding tax justice.

The average taxpayer's voice, heard so clearly earlier this year when the bill was in the House of Representatives, is now being drowned out by the din of the loophole lobby. The mail, on which the senators rely, has slowed to a trickle. Too many people seem to think the tax justice battle was won because of the House action.

It hasn't been won. In fact, we are in danger of losing.

We must do everything in our power to make the voice of those who want tax justice heard in the Senate of the United States.

That means letters—lots of letters—all of them telling the senators we want tax justice.

If we all write right now, we can still win.

J. P. Stevens v. the U.S.

FOR THE FIFTH TIME in a little over two years J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., the world's second largest textile manufacturer, has been ruled guilty of "persistent, long-continued, flagrant violations" of the Taft-Hartley law.

The Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rebuked the firm—frequently awarded federal contracts—as a "four-time loser" which now has earned its fifth "service stripe" for willful defiance of the law. The latest example of Stevens nose-thumbing came in a case involving the unjustified firing of four members of the Textile Workers Union of America.

The appeals judges, voting to enforce an order against Stevens's unlawful threats and firings, called attention to the setting in which the acts were committed—the "atmosphere of persistent, flagrant violations occurring after, and in spite of, repeated declarations of illegality" by the National Labor Relations Board and the courts.

The judges approved the special remedies ordered by the board, but one remedy remains untried—taking away the right of law-defying employers like Stevens to receive government contracts. Labor has urged this Administration, and the previous one, to apply such a remedy.

The case before the court was J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., versus NLRB. It could more accurately be titled Stevens versus the United States.

A Word Edgewise:

Over-Involvement in Politics Poses Risks for Universities

By John P. Roche

TWO RECENT EVENTS, which have not usually been linked, emphasize the risks involved when efforts are made to turn colleges or universities into political objects. The regents of the University of California voted to ban a young Negro Communist named Angela Davis from teaching at the Los Angeles campus. The faculty of the College of Arts and Sciences at Harvard endorsed an immediate pullout from Viet Nam. Both governing bodies employed basically the same justification: the university must go on record in favor of Truth and against Error.

One Harvard professor was quoted as saying that the faculty must stand up and be counted because "everyone is opposed to the war." Miss Davis's dismissal was doubtless based on the equally self-evident proposition that "everyone is opposed to communism." Both decisions raise the fundamental question whether it is proper for the university to become an instrument of conformity, to establish moral standards based on what "everyone" thinks.

Take Miss Davis's case first. As a college student, I had two Communist professors. One was a fine teacher who never allowed his views to color his judgment of students. He made no secret of his beliefs, but never imposed them. The other was an ideological gunner who shot down any student that did not toe the line. The first should have the right to teach anywhere, anytime. The second should have been fired summarily, but not for being a Communist. The proper charge against him would have been his incompetence as a teacher, and it was irrelevant whether he was a Communist, a fascist, a vegetarian, a flat-worlder or an animist.

Within the limits of the criminal law, then, there is only one question properly before the regents: Is Miss Davis a competent teacher? (This whole affair gives me a sense of having been here before. In fact, I was. I opposed on precisely this ground the Joe McCarthy frenzy for firing Communists, a frenzy that peaked in California in the early '50s.)

The action of the Harvard faculty (which echoed that of the Columbia senate) is in a somewhat different category. Again, however, we have the same effort to establish an atmosphere of conformity on public issues. It is all very well for faculty members as individuals to go on record opposing the war in Viet Nam, supporting Israel or Biafra, or denouncing the Soviet coup in Prague. But when the institution itself is wheeled into the fray, something more is involved. In effect, those who dissent are labeled moral lepers by official edict. The next logical step is to require the dissenters to wear a distinctive arm band, as the Star of David was employed in Nazi universities.

BEING SINGLED OUT for this kind of infamy is hardly the equivalent of being shipped to Dachau, but it does subtly influence the climate of opinion in an academic community. The timid ones among both students and faculty hit the ground muttering the approved cliches. One colleague put it to me this way: "Roche, you're a masochist. One anti-Viet Nam speech and you would be a public hero."

Maybe, but I have never made my decisions by taking a poll of student or faculty opinion. Back in the '50s, I didn't give a damn if "everybody" thought Communist teachers should be fired. And right now, I don't give a damn if "everybody" thinks we should abandon Viet Nam.

I may be as wrong about Angela Davis's dismissal as I am about Viet Nam; I make no claim to divine inspiration. But while my views are always open to challenge and re-examination, I don't want any coercive body—whether Congress, the state legislature, a board of regents, a church, a university faculty or students—setting out authoritative doctrine. In particular, a college or university should not emulate the Inquisition. We are searching for truth, not establishing it.

Bayard Rustin Writes:

Myopic Study of IQ Tests Fuels Fallacies on Racial Inequality

WHAT IS INTELLIGENCE? How is it produced? And how can it be measured? These are questions of special interest to social scientists whose job it is to try to provide us with precise, quantifiable answers, and they are also of general interest to all those who are curious about the nature of human development. Historically the debate has been between those who believe that the most important factor determining an individual's intelligence is his natural, genetic endowment. The opposing side has emphasized the supreme importance of such environmental factors as social class, family rearing, and the quality of schooling.

This nature-nurture debate is no doubt intellectually stimulating, and social scientists will continue to publish studies defending one side or the other. But there are times when the debate takes on an ugly racial character. One race is claimed to be inherently superior (Hitler's Aryans as an example) or another is "proven" to be inherently inferior.

I do not think it at all coincidental that in America such theories tend to appear during periods of intense racial conflict. Around the turn of the century, when the legal structure of segregation was being solidified in the South, numerous "studies" appeared, such as Robert W. Shufeldt's "The Negro, a Menace to American Civilization," which rationalized popular racist attitudes.

Today, when the consciousness of racial distinctions is unusually intense and there is growing racial antagonism in the society, the question is once again being debated of whether Negroes are inherently inferior to whites.

The focus of the debate is a study which appeared in the Harvard Educational Review almost a year ago. It was written by Arthur Jensen and it purported to prove, on the basis of IQ test scores, that intelligence and the ability to reason abstractly are overwhelmingly determined by genetic factors, and that blacks have less intelligence than whites.

The study has aroused a furor, and justifiably so, for its conclusion violates the faith shared by men of good will in the potential for a democratic, racially equal society; and worse, it provides more grist for the bigot's mill. But what seems essential at the present time is less indignant emotion and more critical thought.

In discussing the Jensen report we must clearly distinguish between its intellectual legitimacy and its political effect. If he is correct, we must accept his conclusions regardless of whether we like them or not. But I do not think that he is correct. Jensen's study is based on IQ test scores, not on genetic data, and nobody has ever proven that IQ measures intelligence. (One person has sarcastically written that it measures only IQ.)

It is true that IQ measures the ability of a child to take an IQ test, but this ability depends upon the successful learning of certain psychological processes. (One can hardly expect an infant to take an IQ test.) Jensen merely assumes that all American children have an equal opportunity to learn these processes, but this assumption fails to take into consideration the terribly unequal environmental conditions under which children—particularly black and white children—are reared in America.

IQ does, to a degree, accurately predict achievement in school, but this may well be more an indication that children are treated according to their IQ and produce only what is expected of them than that their achievement is genetically determined.

The psychologist Benjamin Bloom has responded to Jensen by pointing out that under the equal conditions of an Israeli Kibbutz, Jewish children of European origin, who normally have an IQ of 105, have a tested IQ of 115, while Jewish children of Oriental (Mid-eastern) origin, who normally have an IQ of 85, have also been tested at 115.

Jensen did not consider this kind of data, but based most of his conclusions on studies with identical twins who have common genes and fairly similar IQ scores when they are raised in different families. But even one-sixth of the identical twins reared apart differ as much in IQ—15 points—as blacks and whites.

THIS DIFFERENCE is entirely due to environment since their genes are the same, and I do not think it is too much to assume that the radically unequal conditions under which blacks and whites live might produce a similar difference in IQ.

Christopher Jencks, a social scientist, has argued persuasively that Jensen did not substantiate his claim that the IQ differences between blacks and whites are genetically determined. Jencks concludes from this that "Jensen's decision to reopen this ancient controversy without first gathering more evidence strikes me as a serious political blunder."

Indeed it is, for whatever Jensen's intent was in writing his report (and I doubt that it was racist) its effect has been to profoundly offend black people and to provide bigoted white people with a new argument with which to defend their racist beliefs and actions.

My own feeling is that the Jensen study is irrelevant and that we should dismiss it entirely. It is irrelevant because it tells us nothing we can believe and it contributes nothing to our struggle for social equality. Rather than quibble over a study which suggests the permanence of inequality, we must work to change those social and economic conditions which determined the nature of Jensen's conclusions.

If we can change these conditions, we can make life livable for black people in America, and though we would not have intended it, we would have provided social scientists with new data with which to refute the theory of inherent racial inequality.

'Decent Level' Stressed:

50% Social Security Increase Held Essential to Beneficiaries

A 50 PERCENT INCREASE is essential to bring social security benefits "up to a decent level," the AFL-CIO's top social insurance expert declared in a network radio interview.

Until that level is reached, benefit increases must be for greater than just the cost of living, said Bert Seidman of the Dept. of Social Security on Labor News Conference. Although Pres. Nixon has included a cost-of-living escalator in his social security proposals, Seidman said, adoption of the principle is "by no means certain" in the 91st Congress.

Seidman praised the social security improvement bill introduced by Rep. Jacob Gilbert (D-N.Y.), noting that the measure would result, by 1972, in an increase in (total) social security benefits "significantly better than 50 percent."

He stressed three key Medicare changes also included in the Gilbert bill:

- A full pre-payment basis for the system, "so that the elderly would no longer have to pay a monthly premium after they have retired and their incomes are very low."
- Medicare coverage for the disabled who are under age 65.
- Prescription drugs under Medicare coverage, which the elderly now pay on an "out-of-pocket basis."

THE GILBERT MEASURE would boost overall social security benefits by 20 percent on Jan. 1, 1970 and another 20 percent boost two years later. The measure sets the minimum benefit for a single person at $90 per month and raises it to $120 on Jan. 1, 1972. Couples would receive a minimum of $120 in January 1970 and $180 in 1972.

Seidman said that another important provision of the Gilbert bill calls for raising widow's benefits under social security to 100 percent of the husband's benefit, had he lived.

Questioning Seidman were Theodor Schuchat of the North American Newspaper Alliance and Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times.

By Press Associates, Inc.

WHEN THE EMPLOYMENT RATE for September hit 4 percent there was more than just a perfunctory reaction to a statistic among liberals and labor leadership.

The 4 percent came as a clanging warning that the Nixon "war on inflation" through tight money and similar fiscal measures is beginning to get the kind of result that organized labor dreads—a slowing down in the economy with higher unemployment.

The boost in the jobless rate during September from 3.5 percent to 4 percent represents a serious reversal in the downward trend of unemployment which produced a 3.3 percent rate last January. Further, it brings up the specter of what has happened in the past, the ups and downs of the jobless rate and its attendant effects on the lives of millions of workers.

The jobless rate, in fact, represents a significant guide to the values that an administration places on people and property, which has priority, and which is its deepest concern.

When the Hoover Administration turned the government over to Franklin Roosevelt in 1931 the jobless rate was 24.9 percent as a result of the Great Depression. It was Roosevelt's job to bring it down and he did. On the eve of World War II, it was down to 9.9 percent; war orders, of course, brought it crashing down to 1.9 percent.

When Harry Truman took over as the war ended, the rate climbed back to 3.9, mounted to 5.5 percent as the war was liquidated but dropped again, in part due to Korea. When Eisenhower became President in 1953 it was down to 2.5 percent. Eight years and three recessions later, the rate was back to 5.5 percent.

The policies of the Eisenhower Administration are significant in the history of unemployment statistics, and throw a strong light on today's employment story.

The 2.5 percent unemployment rate that Eisenhower inherited disappeared steadily under the fiscal and "tight money" policies of his Administration. Ending of the Korean war brought a 5 percent jobless rate, but after a low of 3.8 in 1956, the rate started climbing again and when Eisenhower left office in 1961 John F. Kennedy inherited a 5.5 percent rate.

During the Kennedy-Johnson Democratic years, there was a determined struggle to drive down unemployment. It was down to 4.5 percent when Johnson took office again in 1965 and when Richard M. Nixon took the oath of office in January of this year, the rate was down to 3.3 percent.

The war in Viet Nam, of course, played a role in the drop to 3.3 percent, but again, it was clear from the first that Nixon was determined to give dollar stability the priority in his Administration rather than jobs.

Increases in the cost of living became the statistic to be watched by the Administration rather than the unemployment rate.

THE NIXON DRIVE to "cool" the economy was accompanied by promises that workers would not be asked to pay the price with their jobs. Labor economists knew that this was nonsense, that a slowdown in the economy inevitably would be accompanied by a drop in jobs. This is now happening. The big question that now remains to be answered is: How far will it go?

The answers so far are not reassuring. Nixon's Treasury officials have made it clear that unemployment will go as high as is needed to stop inflation.

Labor economists concede that there is a rate below which unemployment cannot be expected to drop. In a huge labor force such as that of the United States, there are a certain number of people more or less unemployable who drift from job to job with periods of unemployment between them and a number of workers in the process of changing jobs or waiting for jobs to open up.

The rate of this "frictional" unemployment is generally placed at between 2 and 2.5 percent. The 3 percent range of the past year is clearly above the "frictional" level.

The current 4 percent is clearly a danger signal. Pres. Nixon will have to decide how far up he will let it go.

LIFTING SOCIAL SECURITY benefits to a "decent level" would take a 50 percent boost, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman, center, declared on the public affairs program, Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Theodor Schuchat, left, of the North American Newspaper Alliance and Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times. The interview is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m. on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

polls by the Associated Press and United Press International continued to show substantially more senators against the nomination than supporting confirmation.

There was early evidence, that the GOP swing against Haynsworth hadn't been halted by the White House appeal. Just three days later, Sen. Richard S. Schweiker (R-Pa.) announced that he will vote against confirmation.

The Pennsylvania Republican said Haynsworth had shown himself to be insensitive to potential conflicts of interest and to violations of judicial canons of ethics.

Meany, in a four-page statement of comment, made it clear that labor's opposition to the appointment is not an effort to embarrass the President on a political issue.

He noted that before the nomination was announced, the AFL-CIO had conveyed to the President "privately and without publicity" all the facts it then knew about the judge's involvement in the Carolina Vend-A-Matic Co.

"We urged that Haynsworth not be nominated," he said, "because we believe only men of proven integrity and unblemished character should be justices of the Supreme Court."

If there has been "piecemeal disclosure" of Haynsworth's financial involvements, Meany said, "the blame for this lies with the judge and the Justice Dept."

Neither Haynsworth nor the Justice Dept. made a full disclosure of his financial interests to the Senate Judiciary Committee. The Justice Dept. memoranda, issued as the result of committee findings, "read like briefs for a defendant—not the impartial, factual statements the people have a right to expect."

And Haynsworth "made contradictory statements to the committee and took refuge in a claimed lack of memory."

As an example, Haynsworth informed the committee that he had disqualified himself in all cases "in which I had a stock interest in a party or in one which would be directly affected by the outcome of the litigation."

Meany noted that "at the hearing it was proved and the judge now admits at least four cases in which this was not true."

"It was not from information volunteered by Haynsworth or the Justice Dept., but from evidence unearthed by a newspaper reporter" that the Senate learned that Haynsworth's stake in Carolina Vend-A-Matic amounted to nearly $500,000, Meany stressed.

Meany sharply challenged the Justice Dept.'s retreat from accepted standards of judicial conduct to absolve Haynsworth of conflict of interest violations.

He said the department "now takes the position that a judge may directly sit on a case when he owns stock in one of the litigants as long as this ownership is not significant and he does not use his influence in behalf of that litigant."

This interpretation, Meany said, is "clearly at odds" with the legal requirements for members of government regulatory agencies. "They are not only forbidden to sit on cases involving a litigant in which they have a stock interest; they go to jail if they do so."

Meany commented that "no one can seriously contend that commissioners in agencies such as the Federal Power Commission must abide by higher ethical standards than justices of the Supreme Court."

While the President has every right to decide to "fight all the way for his nominee," Meany said, in this case the decision is not "a wise one."

He added: "For our part, we believe the AFL-CIO also has a right and an obligation. It is to oppose any nominee not fit to be on the highest bench."

Sanctions Dropped Against RWDSU

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has announced the removal of sanctions imposed against the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union under Section 16, Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution.

In a letter to presidents of affiliates, Meany said the RWDSU "is now in full compliance with Article XX and entitled to full protection under the Internal Disputes Plan as well as all other rights enjoyed by AFL-CIO affiliates in good standing."

A letter of Oct. 22, 1968, advising all affiliates that the union had been found in non-compliance "is herewith rescinded and the sanctions imposed by that letter are removed," Meany said.

Drive for Tax Justice Pressed To Block 'Big Steal' in Senate

on reform of tax rates so as to lessen some of the squeeze on persons with low and middle-bracket incomes.

But what it has done so far has been to make a weak bill weaker.

The AFL-CIO had estimated that the government could pick up nearly $17 billion a year in added revenue by closing loopholes—enough to permit significant tax relief for the ordinary wage-earner and still finance an expansion of needed government programs.

The House bill narrowed a number of loopholes. But it still perpetuated, although to a lesser degree, what labor has considered the biggest injustice in the present tax system. People whose income comes from wages and salaries would pay the full tax rate; those whose income comes from "unearned" sources, such as profits from investments in stocks and real estate, would pay a lower rate. And some income would remain virtually tax-exempt.

During the spring and summer months, while tax legislation was before the House and Congress was being flooded by letters calling for tax justice, sentiment in the Senate was strong for a thoroughgoing, loophole-closing tax bill.

Lobbyists Move In

When the House acted in early August—by a 394-30 vote—the biggest hurdle appeared to have been overcome. The public pressure dropped off—and the special interest lobbyists moved into the vacuum.

As an example, take the day the Senate committee met in closed session to consider a portion of the House bill dealing with taxation of bank profits.

While the committee met, United Press International reported in a news dispatch, "more than two dozen lobbyists, representing financial institutions with millions of dollars at stake, lined a Senate building corridor."

The outcome was an estimated $250 million-a-year tax break for the banks.

Under present law, banks are allowed to set aside as untaxed reserves against "bad debts" an amount substantially larger than experience shows is necessary. The House bill would have limited this tax-exempt reserve to a realistic figure, ending the windfall. The Senate committee undid most of this loophole-closing provision.

Another item that didn't make any headlines, but marked a victory for the business lobbyists, particularly in the oil industry:

The House had voted to close the loophole that allows American companies to deduct from taxes owed to the United States an amount equal to taxes paid to foreign governments. That would have brought in an additional $65 million a year in revenue.

The Senate Finance Committee dropped that provision from the bill.

The oil lobby had to settle for a half-loaf victory on the controversial oil depletion allowance.

Under present law, 27.5 percent of the taxable income of an oil or gas company is tax-free. The House had approved a modest narrowing of this loophole to 20 percent. In the Senate Finance Committee, a motion to retain the 27.5 percent exclusion lost on an 8-8 tie. The committee then voted, 12-3, to compromise on a 23 percent depletion allowance. It would save the oil industry some $250 million in taxes as compared with the House bill.

On capital gains—which AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany termed "the major flaw in the tax system" and a Treasury study described as "the most important factor in reducing the tax rates of those with high incomes"—the House voted very modest reforms.

It said a taxpayer would have to hold a stock or property for a full year, instead of just six months, before he would be eligible for the reduced rate tax on his capital gains profits. And it said that while the tax on capital gains income would continue to be only half the regular rate, wealthy taxpayers could no longer take the option of paying a 25 percent tax, if this should be a lesser amount.

The Administration in this case allied itself with the business lobbyists, contending that a higher capital gains tax might "remove a large measure of the incentive for private capital to engage in new and expanded business ventures."

Whatever the reason, the Senate committee voted to keep the present six-month requirement for capital gains tax windfalls and to allow the 25 percent rate for all but the wealthest taxpayers.

The Senate committee not only left the bond interest tax-free; it excluded the interest from a minimum tax provision and allocation of deductions. The effect would be to allow some millionaires to continue to escape paying any income tax.

In a few areas, the Senate panel improved the House bill—in one important section by keeping the maximum tax rate where it is now, instead of dropping it to 50 percent.

Unlike the no-amendment rule the House invokes when acting on tax legislation, the bill will be wide open to amendments when it reaches the Senate floor.

This, of course, is a two-edged sword. It means that special interest lobbyists who were unable to get all they wanted in committee will have a second chance. It means, also, that a revived public concern over tax justice could prod a majority of the Senate into strengthening the committee bill.

Atlanta Elects Mayor With Labor Backing

Atlanta—Sam Massell, the labor-endorsed candidate for mayor of Atlanta, easily won a runoff election against Rodney Cook, a moderate Republican who had the backing of the business community and the local newspapers.

Massell, 42, received nearly 55 percent of the vote to become the city's first Jewish mayor. Massell is the current vice mayor and a Democrat, but the municipal election is run on a non-partisan basis. He led a field of eight candidates in the first election, Oct. 7.

In the earlier voting, another COPE endorsed candidate, Maynard Jackson, won a clear victory over three other contenders to become the first Negro vice mayor of Atlanta, at least since Reconstruction days.

The Atlanta newspapers said the election results reflected the strength of a "new coalition" of white liberals, organized labor and the black community. The local AFL-CIO said the voting patterns showed that Massell and Jackson received overwhelming support among trade unionists and virtually 100 percent of the Negro vote.

The Atlanta runoff preceded by two weeks most of the 1969 election activity in the rest of the country. Standing out among the state, county and municipal elections set for Nov. 4 are these:

New Jersey—A contest for governor between former Gov. Robert B. Meyner (D) and Rep. William Cahill (R) plus election of the entire state Assembly, now heavily Republican.

Virginia—A governor's race between William Battle (D) and Linwood Holton (R) and election of the House of Delegates, now overwhelmingly Democratic.

Kentucky—Election of half the state Senate and the entire House of Representatives.

New York—Three-way race for mayor pitting Mario Proccacino (D), John Marchi (R), and incumbent Mayor John Lindsay, running as a Liberal-Independent.

Cleveland — Incumbent Mayor Carl Stokes (D) faces a tough challenge from Ralph Perk (R) in a normally Democratic city.

Detroit — Non-partisan election for mayor pits two survivors of a crowded primary—County Auditor Richard Austin, a Negro, and Sheriff Roman Gribbs.

Pittsburgh — Peter Flaherty (D) faces John Tabor (R) in a closely fought mayoral contest.

APOLLO 11 ASTRONAUT Col. Edwin E. Aldrin, Jr., following his address to the convention, was shown a sample of china that the AFL-CIO is sending to the wives of all three members of the historic moon mission. Federation Pres. A team of volunteers begins home construction in Plaquemines Parish

Labor Volunteers Rebuild Homes For Victims of Hurricane Camille

The volunteers come from the AFL-CIO building trades — carpenters, plumbers, painters, electricians, iron workers, laborers—and from many other unions: Longshoremen, Communications Workers, Office & Professional Employes, Oil & Chemical Workers and State, County & Municipal Employes.

The rebuilding project is centered in Plaquemines Parish, which took the brunt of the killer hurricane as it swept across the Gulf Coast communities.

Building supplies are being furnished by the American Red Cross and labor's part in the program is being coordinated by Louisiana AFL-CIO Pres. Victor Bussie. The volunteer workers provide their own tools and equipment.

The volunteers assemble at the Belle Chasse Red Cross Disaster Headquarters some 50 miles above Plaquemines Parish where they are assigned to 42-man teams. Each team is made up of 11 carpenters, six painters, three electricians, four plumbers, three roofers, eight laborers, truck and bus drivers and a job foreman.

The 20 teams are loaded on a convoy of school buses while state highway trucks haul their equipment to Empire.

After the Red Cross serves breakfast, the teams are assigned to their homesites for the weekend project.

Smiles and Tears

Smiling faces — some streaked with tear marks—greeted the volunteers as they arrived at the building sites.

The Ancalade family has owned a one-acre homesite in the shadow of the Mississippi River levee for four generations. Five homes stood there before the hurricane cut a swath through the community—and then there was just rubble.

But after the first weekend of work by the volunteers, three new homes dotted the site. Mrs. Lorrenza Ancalade, the 90-year-old matriarch of the clan, nodded approvingly as the home took shape.

"I want to move in right away," she said. "This is my home."

She will share the home with her son Luke, 65, a retired tugboat captain. Her son Leon with his wife and two children will live in the second house. Her daughter and son-in-law Sidney and Mabel Duplisses will move into the third.

Some foundations for the homes were laid in late September by a vanguard of 100 union volunteers. Other foundation crews will continue to build bases for the future building projects of subsequent weekends.

The Red Cross reports that it has designated $1.1 million to aid the hurricane victims in the parish. Families whose homes are being rebuilt were selected on the basis of immediate needs, according to ARC disaster relief worker Russ Jones.

The volunteer effort of the AFL-CIO is expected to cut the construction costs of the homes in half, Jones added.

The homes are built according to plans provided by the Red Cross. They have one, two or three bedrooms, according to the needs of the families.

By Sunday afternoon after two days of work, most of the 15 homes in the weekend projects are nearly ready for occupancy, although the families may have to wait a few days before utilities are put in service. The Red Cross case workers also assist the families in selecting new furniture for the homes.

The workers are sheltered at a high school in Empire where they also receive their meals from the Red Cross. Tents have been provided for additional sleeping facilities.

At the close of each weekend project, the union volunteers receive service awards from both the State AFL-CIO and the Red Cross.

The contingents of volunteers come from throughout the state, but the major areas represented are New Orleans, Baton Rouge, Lafayette, Lake Charles and Plaquemines Parish.

E. V. Bighinatti, Red Cross director for Hurricane Camille operations, said this is the largest joint building project ever undertaken by the AFL-CIO and the Red Cross. A similar program, but on a smaller scale, was conducted by labor and the ARC after Hurricane Audrey struck Cameron Parish in 1957.

Some of the volunteers also came from outside the labor movement. One such was State Sen. Michael O'Keefe of New Orleans who has been a longtime supporter of labor causes in the Louisiana legislature.

O'Keefe delivered a message of thanks from Gov. John J. McKeithen to the volunteers after working alongside the building crews on the first weekend project.

The AFL-CIO issues a manual to the volunteers on what they can expect during the weekend project. Bussie tells the volunteers:

"We assure you that you will be tired, dirty, hot and probably disgusted, but we sincerely hope that you will feel it was worth it—and that you will sleep well and happy Sunday night in your own bed knowing that you helped to make it possible for a family to move into a home which you and your friends built. . . . Thank you for all you have done."

Labor Warns of Recession Threat:

Nixon Asks Wage 'Restraint' In Drive to Combat Inflation

Pres. Nixon called on unions to exercise "restraint" in seeking wage increases for workers at the bargaining table as a way of fighting inflation.

The President also asked business and industry to "consider" pricing policies in the light of his anti-inflation program. Errors in overpricing, he warned, will make businesses competitive losers.

Nixon's appeals were contained in a letter reportedly sent to 2,200 labor and business leaders. The letter followed a national radio broadcast in which the President declared that the nation is "on the road to recovery from the disease of runaway prices."

But in both his address and the letter, Nixon said that the situation is not fully under control, and he spoke of further "bad medicine" and future "slowing pains."

AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger, in an address at the University of Pittsburgh, warned that the Administration's economic policies could lead to a recession and "their effects are inequitable."

"We will support Nixon," Goldfinger said, "if restraints are placed on all costs, prices, dividends and executive compensation as well as on wages and salaries, and if the Administration repeals tax credits, fast depreciation, curbs mergers, and spotlights the pricing policies of industry."

In another development, the President announced the selection of Dr. Arthur F. Burns, one of his key advisers and a former chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, to become chairman of the Federal Reserve Board when the term of William McChesney Martin expires next Jan. 31.

The appointment, subject to Senate confirmation, is not expected to change the board's direction. Both Burns and Martin are regarded as conservatives, and Burns has supported Martin's policy of tight money as a means of controlling inflation.

In his letter, Nixon claimed the Administration has applied "backbone" to economic policy to put the government's "economic house in order before enlisting other forces in the fight against inflation."

He cited such actions as the proposed extension of the income tax surcharge, a proposed reduction in federal expenditures of $7 billion a year and a cutback on federal construction.

However, Nixon contended that "the danger of inflation" is still present and "the cure will require some unpleasant medicine, patience on the part of all and self-discipline by the government, business and labor."

"It is in the interest of every union leader and workingman to avoid wage demands that will reduce the purchasing power of his dollar and reduce the number of job opportunities," Nixon said.

"It is in the interest of private business to consider pricing policies in the light of the government's determination to check inflation," he added.

Nixon said the the government, on its part, would move "with a careful eye on the unemployment picture." He added, "the percentage of our work force unemployed is more than a statistic—it is a human condition that deserves the close attention of every American."

In an afternoon radio address, apparently timed to reach housewives, Nixon said that the Administration's economic policies are working because while prices are still going up their rate of increase is slowing down.

He said that Americans "for some time to come" will be reading about certain businesses not dong very well, sluggish sales in department stores, and a decline in new housing, "which this nation needs."

Ordinarily, Nixon said, these developments are "bad news." But today, he continued, such declines are "slowing pains" and "just like growing pains, these are a healthy development. . . ."

The President ruled out the imposition of wage and price controls as "bad for business, bad for the working man, bad for the consumer." He also repeated his previously expressed opposition to "guidelines" for wages on grounds they would not get at the cause of inflation.

He urged consumers to show restraint on purchases and credit expenditures as a means of bringing down prices. And he asked state and local governments to postpone expenditures for the same reason.

In addressing a University of Pittsburgh conference on business prospects, Goldfinger warned that "the danger of a recession is growing from week to week" because of the Administration's economic policies.

He charged that tight money and other "restrictive" measures are stifling the critical need for housing, the building of public facilities and the rebuilding of ghetto areas in the cities.

Emphasizing that wage gains are not responsible for inflation but that "skyrocketing" interest rates are, Goldfinger said that the average increase in real hourly pay is less than 2 percent under labor agreements negotiated this year.

"In four years," he added, "there has been no advance in the after-tax buying power of earnings of the rank-and-file worker."

What is happening, Goldfinger said, is that many workers "are being forced to shoulder the burden of Nixon's economic policies" in one of two ways—through additional unemployment or declining purchasing power.

He also stresed the importance of Congress closing tax loopholes for the wealthy in a tax system "rigged against" wages and salaries. "If we can't solve the tax problem, we'll be increasingly in trouble," Goldfinger concluded.

Negroes Bear Brunt Of Unemployment Rise

A new Labor Dept. report has reinforced findings that rising unemployment is hitting Negroes hardest and is widening the jobless gap between whites and blacks.

The trend has been brought into focus by the latest Bureau of Labor Statistics survey of the employment situation in the poverty neighborhoods of the nation's largest 100 cities. These are defined by the government as the poorest one-fifth of the neighborhoods in each urban area.

The overall unemployment rate in the poverty neighborhoods of 5.7 percent in the third quarter of 1969 was down two-tenths of 1 percent from a year earlier, the report showed.

But it also revealed that while the jobless rate for whites in the neighborhoods fell from 5.2 to 4.4 percent over the year, the rate for blacks increased from 6.9 to 7.5 percent.

Most of the improvement in the white workers' rate was due to a sharp drop in joblessness among adult women, while the rate for adult black women "rose significantly over the year," BLS said.

The report indicated that nearly three of every 10 black teenagers in poverty neighborhoods were unemployed in the third quarter of 1969, while nearly one out of five white teenagers in the neighborhoods were jobless.

The figures represented a worsening of the job situation for both black and white teenagers over the year.

The overall teenage unemployment rate of 22.6 percent in the poverty neighborhoods was 2.1 times the rate for teenagers in other areas of the large cities during the third quarter. A year earlier the jobless rate for poverty neighborhood teenagers was only 1.6 times as large.

Other highlights of the report showed:

- The poverty neighborhoods unemployment rate of 5.7 percent in the third quarter of this year compared with 3.7 percent in other urban neighborhoods and 3.3 percent for the nation as a whole.
- Unemployment in the poverty neighborhoods totaled 365,000 in the third quarter, down about 20,000 over the year. The poverty neighborhoods accounted for 12.1 percent of the nation's total unemployment during the period. In 1968, they accounted for 13.3 percent of total joblessness.

The latest monthly job report of the BLS showed that the nation's overall jobless rate jumped five-tenths of 1 percent to 4 percent in September, its highest level in 23 months.

The jobless rate for whites was 3.6 percent, up seven-tenths of 1 percent since February, while the rate for Negroes was 6.8 percent, up 1.1 percent from its February level.

Consumer Prices Continue Climb, Clothes and Services Lead Advance

The cost of living shot higher again in September and the average worker's paycheck continued to buy less than it did a year ago, the Labor Dept. reported.

The Consumer Price Index rose by five-tenths of 1 percent to 129.3. This means that it cost $12.93 in September to buy goods and services valued at $10 in the base period, 1957-59.

The index was 5.8 percent above last year. It has risen by 4.5 percent since Jan. 1 compared with a 3.4 percent increase for the same period in 1968. Recent jumps in the index have been four-tenths of 1 percent in August, five-tenths in July and six-tenths in June.

Arnold Chase, assistant commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, said the September rise was below the average annual 6 percent increase through August.

Gross average weekly earnings of production and non-supervisory workers rose by $1.29 from August to a new high of $117.80, due to a 5-cent advance in average hourly earnings.

Hourly earnings usually increase in September, as many of the young people returning to school leave jobs with low hourly rates, BLS pointed out.

Weekly take-home pay for the worker with three dependents increased by 99 cents over the month to $102.44. The rise for the worker with no dependents was 95 cents to $93.90.

When expressed in 1957-59 dollars to reflect price changes, the take-home pay was $79.23 for the worker with three dependents and $72.16 for the worker with no dependents, up more than 40 cents over the month in both cases.

But, these real spendable earnings represented a loss of 39 cents over the year for the worker with three dependents and a cut of 16 cents for the worker with no dependents.

Among major components on the index, food is up 5.9 percent from last year, commodities are 4.8 percent higher and services have risen by 7.4 percent.

In analyzing the September price rise, Chase said, "Nearly everything in the family budget was higher. The only declines were in fresh fruits and vegetables and cars."

The cost of home ownership spurted up by nine-tenths of 1 percent during the month, Chase said, mainly because of higher prices for buying homes, maintaining them and financing them. Rent advanced by three-tenths of 1 percent.

As in August, charges for consumer services advanced by seven-tenths of 1 percent. Medical care costs rose by eight-tenths of 1 percent to go 7.7 percent above the level of a year ago. Auto insurance, local transit fares, movie admissions and gas and electricity rates were up.

Apparel prices climbed by 1.7 percent—more than double the usual increase for September—due to bigger than normal price increases in the fall line of women's coats, dresses and skirts.

Food prices were up slightly whereas they usually drop in September, BLS reported. Pork and restaurant meals were up. Fruits and vegetables declined less than seasonally.

Approximately 54,000 workers will receive cost-of-living pay hikes based on September's CPI. About 22,000 of them, mostly in aerospace, will get boosts of 8 or 9 cents an hour. About 21,000 workers, in aerospace and public transit, will get increases of from 3 to 5 cents. An additional 5,400 workers in various industries will get raises ranging from 2 to 7 cents.

High Church Honor Awarded Meany

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany was invested as a Knight Commander of the Order of St. Gregory the Great with Grand Cross by Patrick Cardinal O'Boyle in a ceremony at St. Matthew's Chancery in Washington, D.C.

The investiture was followed by a luncheon given by members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council at which a presentation was made to Fu Jen Catholic University in Taiwan in Meany's name.

Cardinal O'Boyle spoke at the luncheon of his long years of friendship with the AFL-CIO president and of the role of the labor movement in American life. Meany thanked the cardinal and Pope Paul VI for the high church honor and spoke of the close links between religion and the labor movement in the struggle for social justice.

Bakery Unions Call Merger Conventions

Two unions of bakery workers issued calls for merger conventions in Miami Beach—the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers for a Dec. 1 meeting in the Plaza Hotel and the Bakery & Confectionery Workers in the Americana. A joint convention will follow on Dec. 3 or 4, the unions said.

Labor Rallies Full Strength In Support of GE Strikers

Meany Pins Inflation on High Profits

The rise in living costs can be slowed by changes in the price and profit policies of American business, the AFL-CIO told Pres. Nixon.

Replying to a letter from the President on the question of inflation, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany voiced labor's concern with rising prices and noted that they are "washing out all or most of the buying power of workers' collective bargaining gains in the past several years."

The major causes of the rising price level, he told the President "are to be found in business pricing policies and profits." Changes in these policies are needed, he stressed, to slow down the rise of living costs.

The AFL-CIO president pointed out that Labor Sec. George Shultz told the AFL-CIO convention recently that the median wage increase, after accounting for the rise in consumer prices, has been only a little under 2 percent in the first year of the agreements negotiated in the past year.

The buying power of the average non-supervisory worker's weekly take-home pay after federal tax deductions in 1969, Meany said, "has been hardly any greater than last year or in 1965, four years ago."

Demands for wage increases are "obviously based," Meany continued, on prior increases in the cost-of-living. Unions seek in bargain-

Haynsworth Ruling Linked to Stevens

It's no thanks to Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., that the J. P. Stevens textile chain has been ordered to bargain with a union at a Georgia plant where the company's illegal acts made a fair election impossible.

Haynsworth handed down a decision in a similar case in which he said the National Labor Relations Board had no power to order an employer to recognize a union on the basis of signed authorization cards.

The Supreme Court disagreed. It reversed the Haynsworth decision and upheld the NLRB.

It was this precedent that the NLRB relied on when it ordered Stevens to the bargaining table.

NEW EXECUTIVE ORDER governing labor-management relations in the federal service was signed by Pres. Nixon during his White House meeting with the AFL-CIO Executive Council. The President and the council discussed a broad range of issues, including the Viet Nam situation, inflation, and domestic legislation.

For Federal Employes:

Nixon Sets Policy In Labor Relations

Significant changes in labor-management relations policy within the federal government have been incorporated in a new executive order signed by Pres. Nixon Oct. 29.

The new order, replacing the now-famous No. 10988 issued by Pres. Kennedy in 1962 and hailed at the time as a major breakthrough in federal labor policy, was released after a meeting at the White House between the President and the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

Of major importance in the new order is the creation of a Federal Labor Relations Council to administer the program, decide major policy issues and issue rules and regulations. Previously administration had been in the hands of various departments and agencies.

The labor relations council will have authority to issue binding arbitration decisions on grievance disputes and questions of interpretation of contracts.

The new order calls also for establishment of a Federal Service Impasse Panel to help resolve disputes in negotiations and "take any action it considers necessary to settle an impasse." Panel members will be appointed by the President.

The various form of recognition extended to groups of government workers was revised and clarified. The virtually meaningless category of "informal" recognition is abolished and the "formal" category will be abolished in a year.

This would reduce the recognition category to "exclusive," based on winning a majority in an election, and national consultation rights, which covers a wide area short of actual right to negotiate.

There were no changes in the checkoff rules in the old order and the new order prohibits union security arrangements.

Exclusive recognition will be granted only through a secret ballot representation election, eliminating the present option of card checks. However the new order abolishes a requirement of the

Labor Urges Aid to Schools On Integration

Labor has hailed a unanimous Supreme Court decision that the nation's school districts must end school segregation "immediately" and operate desegregated schools "now and hereafter."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany termed the ruling "one of the most important, most necessary and longest overdue decisions of our time."

He appealed to the Administration to join with labor in urging Congress to make a "massive investment" of federal funds for education so that no state will be able to plead poverty as an excuse for stalling school desegregation.

Aid Pledged To 150,000 By Council

By Eugene A. Kelly

The AFL-CIO Executive Council called on the entire labor movement to rally behind striking members of 13 unions walking picket lines at General Electric Co. plants across the nation.

"We intend to help the GE strikers win," the council said.

"GE's management, stockholders and customers should heed this warning:

"The only thing that will end the strike against GE is a decent, honorable, realistic contract." (Full text on Page 4.)

Unions representing nearly 150,000 workers in plants, shops and offices of the nation's largest electrical products corporation, walked out at midnight Oct. 26 when GE management refused to change the one flat offer it made two weeks earlier.

GE rebuffed an arbitration proposal made by the unions to head off a walkout and ignored a call from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to negotiate a "reasonable, realistic collective bargaining agreement with a 1969-model wage level."

The strike was the first company-wide walkout of GE employes since 1946.

Just two days after it started, a U.S. Court of Appeals handed down a decision that GE violated the law in 1960 negotiations by using the same "take-it-or-leave-it" approach the unions report the company has followed this year. Two unions have filed new refusal to bargain charges against GE.

The strikers maintained peace-

J. P. Stevens Ordered to Negotiate With Textile Union at Georgia Plant

The National Labor Relations Board has ordered J. P. Stevens & Co. to negotiate with the Textile Workers Union of America for a contract covering workers at its Statesboro, Ga., plant.

A majority of workers at the plant had signed cards authorizing the TWUA to bargain for them. But the NLRB found that the company resorted to the same illegal, union-busting tactics it has used elsewhere to destroy the union's majority.

It applied—for the first time in a J. P. Stevens case—the precedent upheld by the Supreme Court last June that the NLRB can order a company to bargain with a union on the basis of authorization cards when the employer's deliberate unfair labor tactics have prevented a fair election.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock called on the company to come to the bargaining table in response to the NLRB order. But the Stevens chain—as it has in the succession of labor law cases it has lost in recent years—served notice that it will appeal the order in the courts.

The Statesboro case is the sixth successive NLRB decision in which Stevens has been found to have violated the nation's labor law in an effort to keep its workers from organizing.

Pollock had charged a week earlier, after the corporation's fifth straight setback at the hands of a U.S. Court of Appeals, that continued defiance of the labor act by Stevens has "reached the proportions of a national disgrace."

The TWUA has been the victim

United Airline Pact Ratified By Machinists

San Francisco—Machinists for United Air Lines voted by emphatic margins to accept wage increases of more than 35 percent in a new three-year pact.

The vote to ratify United's offer came on the eve of a strike deadline and after the membership turned down two previous offers.

About 18,000 mechanics, ramp and stores employes and food service workers at United shops in the U.S. mainland and Hawaii won wage increases of 11 percent retroactive to Jan. 1, another 6.5 percent retroactive to July 1, and additional increases of 4 percent next Feb. 1, 4 percent next Aug. 1 and a final 5.66 percent as of May 1, 1971.

Monthly salaries for typical groups by next Feb. 1 will be $626 for utility workers, up nearly $104; $731 for ramp and stores employes, up nearly $118; $896 for mechanics, up $144, IAM District 141 Pres. George J. Robinson reported.

In addition, United agreed to full pension payment for eligible employes starting next May 31. It improved dental and hospital plans and shift premiums, vacations and other benefits in a contract that gives IAM members "the highest rates of pay and the greatest earning power in the air transport industry," according to Robinson.

Living-Cost Clause

Other benefits include up to 21 cents an hour in a clause tied to the cost of living; vacations up to six weeks after 25 years; premium pay for line-aircraft service workers; a work day of 7.5 hours for night shifts starting at 5 p.m. or later up to 6 a.m., and unlimited travel passes after 15 years of service.

New contract language guarantees severance pay if a job is lost due to merger; time off for safety committee members to investigate reports of unsafe conditions, and an employe's right to have a union representative with him when being questioned in possible disciplinary cases.

Management agreed that the new contract will be printed in a union shop and bear a union "bug" or label.

Safety Council Names 12 for Labor Awards

Chicago—Six unions and six labor leaders were presented awards here by the Labor Conference of the National Safety Council for outstanding contributions toward accident prevention.

The conference also adopted plans for strengthened labor participation in safety programs; heard an address by George Taylor, executive secretary, AFL-CIO Committee on Safety & Occupational Health; and chose officers for the coming year.

The conference's highest recognition to an organization—the Harry Read Award of Honor—was presented to Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers Local 4-447, Destrehan, La.; Steelworkers Local 6500, Sudbury, Ont.; and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers headquarters, Washington, D.C.

The Harry Read Award of Commendation went to Steelworkers Local 7279, Toledo, and Meat Cutters Local 342, Jamaica, N.Y. The Harry Read Award of Merit went to Steelworkers Local 1005, Hamilton, Ont.

The conference's highest recognition to an individual—its Distinguished Service to Safety Award—was bestowed upon Julius N. Jacobsen, safety chairman of OCAW Local 4-447.

The Harry Read Citation for Meritorious Service to Safety went to Jack R. Suarez, executive secretary, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers District 3, Schenectady, N.Y.; Pat Patterson, safety director; Steelworkers Local 2659, Southgate, Mich.; E. A. Brown, director, Carpenters Joint Apprenticeship & Training Committee, Santa Rosa, Calif.; and Harry M. Black, Machinists Lodge 2215, San Diego, Calif.

The various Harry Read awards honor the late assistant to the AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer for his work in the labor safety field. He was one of the founders of the conference.

Presentations were made by Rex Lauck, assistant editor of the United Mine Workers Journal and retiring chairman of the conference, during the NSC's 57th National Safety Congress.

The conference named Alan Burch, safety director of the Operating Engineers, as its new chairman, to succeed Lauck. Thomas A. Dillon of the Machinists was named to succeed Burch as vice chairman.

Sec.-Treas. Arthur P. Gildea of the Brewery Workers was re-elected NSC vice president for labor. The conference's new officers were sworn in by Operating Engineers Pres. Hunter P. Wharton, currently an NSC trustee and board member.

Unfit for Supreme Court:

2 Lawyers Groups Flunk Haynsworth

The 24,000-member American Trial Lawyers Association has called on the Senate to reject the nomination of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., because he falls short of "the high standards of conduct required and expected of nominees to the U.S. Supreme Court."

The association announced that its 55-member board of governors had voted "overwhelmingly" to oppose Haynsworth's confirmation after studying the record of Senate Judiciary Committee hearings.

Before acting, the association polled a nationwide cross-section of its membership and found 73 percent opposed to the nomination.

Confirmation of Haynsworth, the lawyers' group warned, would undermine public confidence in the Supreme Court.

The leading organization of Negro lawyers, the National Bar Association, also called for rejection of the nomination.

Ability Questioned

The NBA's executive committee voted unanimously to oppose Haynsworth, basing its stand both on the "apparent conflict of interest" in cases he judged and on a demonstrated "lack of ability to impartially adjudicate cases involving civil rights."

Meanwhile, new documentation emerged as to the extent of Haynsworth's involvement in the business affairs of the Carolina Vend-A-Matic Co. after he was named to the federal bench.

In addition to parlaying an initial investment of less than $3,000 into $437,500 when the stock was sold, Haynsworth collected more than $12,000 in director's fees, most of it in a four-year period which covered the time he sat in judgement on cases involving major customers of the company.

A Chicago Daily News story reporting the amount of director fees received by Haynsworth said the fees were paid "under a resolution of the company's board of directors, which authorized the payments because of directors' aid in getting business for the firm."

The news story noted that Haynsworth had testified to the Senate Judiciary Committee that he "never" took part in seeking business for Carolina Vend-A-Matic.

It said that company minutes showed that Haynsworth attended virtually all of the directors' meetings until shortly before the company was sold and received in fees $3,100 in 1960 and $2,600 in 1961, 1962 and 1963.

Despite continued White House pressure on Senate Republicans for confirmation of Haynsworth, the only new announcements of support were from senators who had already been counted as prepared to vote for confirmation.

And Sen. Norris Cotton (R-N.H.), in announcing that he will vote for Haynsworth, said he doubted Haynsworth would be confirmed "if the vote were held tomorrow."

Meanwhile, the U.S. Judicial Conference opened a two-day meeting to consider a proposed new law to restrict off-bench activities of federal judges—and empower the conference to require judges to file annual financial statements.

But only 24 of its 25 members will be present. Haynsworth, who is a member of the conference because of his position of chief judge of a circuit court, will not attend.

An assistant in his Greenville, S. C., office was quoted as saying that Haynsworth is "hesitant to voice any judicial opinion" on the issue in view of the controversy in connection with his own actions.

Retired Income Needs Set at $4,171 per Year

A retired urban couple needed annual income of at least $4,171 last spring to maintain a moderate standard of living, the Labor Dept. reported.

For a lower standard at that time, the retired couple required income of at least $2,892. A third, fuller, more expansive budget was priced at $6,507.

The income requirements are found in a revision of a 1967 Bureau of Labor Statistics study, "Measuring Retired Couples' Living Costs in Urban Areas." It appears in the November Monthly Labor Review, a BLS publication.

According to BLS, the lower budget differs from the moderate and higher budgets by reflecting a smaller proportion of home ownership, excluding air conditioning, more reliance on public transportation, less use of services and greater use of recreation facilities.

By contrast, the higher budget assumes the largest proportion of home ownership, provides some new cars, permits more household appliances and more paid services than the moderate budget.

A majority of the items common to the three budgets are in greater quantity and better quality at each higher level of living.

These are some characteristics of the budgets for the spring of 1969:

Consumption items—food, housing, transportation, clothing, personal care, medical care and other items—cost $2,777 in the lower budget; $3,940 in the moderate budget and $5,883 in the higher budget.

Compared with the two higher budgets, the lower food allowance in the lower budget calls for buying more potatoes, beans, flour and cereal, and less meat, poultry and fish.

The low budget allows the retired couple to enjoy a restaurant meal once a month. The moderate budget permits eating out twice a month. The high budget grants the luxury of three restaurant meals a month.

All three budgets assume that a majority of the retired couples live in small mortgage-free homes. Costs for these couples include taxes, fuel, utilities and repair and maintenance, based on 1967 charges.

Medical care costs were almost the same in each budget. But they accounted for 12 percent of the retired couple's total consumption expenditures in the low budget compared with only 6 percent of those costs in the high budget.

Maritime Unions Welcome Plan To Rejuvenate U.S. Shipping Fleet

Maritime labor has welcomed a new 10-year program proposed by Pres. Nixon "to restore this country to a proud position in the shipping lanes of the world."

America's defense and its economy, Nixon said, require an era in which shipping and shipbuilding "take their place once again among the vigorous competitive industries of this nation."

His program asks Congress to make it possible for U.S. industry to build 30 merchant ships annually over the next 10 years—a rate three times above fiscal 1969. The government would pay about $300 million each year in subsidies to builders, compared to about $232 million last year.

The program also provides for "differential subsidies" for U.S. ship operators to compensate them for higher wage and insurance costs they have over cheap-wage operations under foreign flags.

In summary, the program would inject more federal money immediately into shipping and shipbuilding while being geared to prodding American builders and shippers to adopt modern techniques and ship designs that will permit a later reduction in subsidies.

Pres. Paul Hall of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. said Nixon's program "marks the first time in a third of a century that proposals have been made by the government to overhaul the out-of-date Merchant Marine Act of 1936."

The program also is a "landmark," Hall said, in that it is the first proposal to be made that takes into consideration both the subsidized and unsubsidized areas of the merchant marine industry.

Hall, who also is president of the Seafarers, noted that Congress may feel some amendments will be needed in the program to make it have a "maximum effect" in strengthening the nation's shipping and shipbuilding capacities.

"What is important, however," he added, "is the fact that the President has enunciated a policy that, for the first time, should lead to the full development of our merchant marine."

Joseph Curran, chairman of the AFL-CIO Maritime Committee and president of the Maritime Union, praised the Administration for demonstrating "its awareness of the maritime crisis and its desire to do something about it."

However, he also felt that the program was not broad enough and not positive enough regarding passenger liners.

Nixon's maritime program won favorable congressional reaction. Chairman Edward A. Garmatz (D-Md.) of the House Merchant Marine Committee said he would press for quick hearings on the proposal. "We've got to get these ships built and in the water," he said.

Rep. Thomas F. Foley (D-Wash.), speaking before a luncheon sponsored by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., predicted that the program would receive strong support on a bipartisan basis.

100 Plants Picketed:

Council Pledges Aid To Strikers at GE

ful picket lines at nearly 100 GE locations despite some flareups in Cicero, Ill., Schenectady, N.Y. and Lynn, Mass.

Morale was excellent and inter-union unity prevailed, unions in the Coordinated Bargaining Committee reported. Even though the company kept its doors open, the strike of production workers was described as "99 percent effective."

The AFL-CIO Executive Council held a special meeting to consider strike support. It declared GE has "succeeded in forcing its workers to strike" but "will not succeed in its efforts to destroy their unity, their unions and their spirit."

The corporation advertises that "progress is our most important product," the council said, but "has the most antiquated concept of labor-management relations of any large American corporation.

"This is a strike of the trade union movement.

"It is a strike we will not lose.

"It is a strike that has the complete, whole-hearted determined support of the AFL-CIO."

As a first step in organizing support, the council authorized Meany to name a special three-member committee to "mobilize the financial resources the unions will need to weather the battle ahead."

Meany told a news conference that he has appointed Vice Presidents I. W. Abel, Joseph D. Keenan and Thomas W. Gleason to meet with the striking unions, determine the financing they will need and map a campaign to raise and disburse needed funds "in an equitable manner."

Abel is president of the Steelworkers, Gleason of the Longshoremen, and Keenan is secretary of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. All but the Longshoremen have members out at GE.

Meany said labor will support the strikers "until there is a decent settlement," however long that may take.

GE does not, he emphasized, accept the modern U.S. concept of collective bargaining and has "forced" the current strike.

He said in reply to a question that Pres. Nixon probably will keep the federal government from intervening in the walkout and that the AFL-CIO would "prefer that the Administration stay out."

A day after the strike started, Labor Sec. George Shultz said on a CBS television program that GE is "putting up so much resistance" to union wage hike proposals because it feels its profits may be "squeezed by a large wage increase."

Jennings charged that Shultz had acted like a "partisan spokesman" for GE and said he was "wrong on both his economics and his interpretation of the labor secretary's role in a labor dispute."

Later Shultz relayed to reporters Nixon's comment to Executive Council members that the government will not act except to offer mediation. "He reiterated our intention not to intervene," Shultz said.

Meanwhile GE announced in newspaper ads and broadcasts that its 280 plants in 33 states will be open for any employe who wants to work. The unions called this a throwback to the 1920s, when employers relied on police and deputy sheriffs to help them starve out striking employes.

Negotiators for the 13 GE unions recommended a strike and the union membership voted overwhelmingly to walk out when contracts expired. The negotiators reported:

"The company from the very beginning of negotiations" in August "has refused to bargain in good faith and has embarked on a program to undercut the union as the lawful collective bargaining agent for GE employes.

"It has employed its method of Boulwarism in laying down its one offer, ignoring the bargaining committee while it submitted the offer to members of the union" even before presenting it to the union committee.

Thereafter, the negotiators said, GE "arbitrarily refused to budge from that one single offer, refusing to bargain in good faith on the union's proposal" and counter-proposals.

Other union committees have been bargaining with the Westinghouse Corp. on new terms in contracts due to expire Nov. 10. The Westinghouse offer to date, they said, has been a "carbon copy" of the GE offer—a pay hike of 20 cents an hour; an additional 5 to 25 cents for skilled workers, and wage reopeners in two succeeding years.

GE told the IUE committee, which includes representatives of the other coordinated unions, that it is not pleading inability to pay.

Its profits from 1966 to 1968 rose 14.8 percent after taxes.

Its employe productivity is rising by 5 percent a year.

And the wage increases its unions won three years ago have been wiped out by rising living costs to which GE has contributed by raising prices, union bargainers reported.

RETIRED WORKERS picket General Electric Co. headquarters in New York to protest the inadequate contract offer made by the company. The pickets are retired members of the coalition of unions on strike against GE.

'Take-It-or-Leave-It' Bargaining Ruled Illegal by Appeals Court

New York—The "take-it-or-leave-it" substitute for collective bargaining that General Electric has followed for 20 years is illegal, the 2nd U.S. Circuit of Appeals has ruled.

Unions with 147,000 members, who struck Oct. 26 in protest against the one-offer system the unions call Boulwarism, charged GE still is using the same tactics that led to a strike in 1960. GE denied it, claimed the facts are different this time, and said it will "probably" appeal to the Supreme Court.

GE has used the system devised by Lemuel R. Boulware, its former vice president for employe, community and union relations. The appeals judges called it a violation of the National Labor Relations Act, and enforced a National Labor Relations Board order that GE must bargain fairly.

The order, issued in 1964, is based on GE's 1960 negotiations with the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, one of the 13 striking unions.

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings said of GE's reaction to the court decision: "This is just more of the usual GE deception which the court has condemned. The company's conduct in 1969 negotiations not only falls within the court's indictment, but is far more serious and unlawful than the methods condemned by the court."

Earlier the IUE, which represents 88,000 of GE's striking employes, filed new unfair practice charges accusing the corporation of failing to bargain in good faith and of violating the labor law by:

- Refusing to furnish information the union needs to bargain about wages and other major employe needs.
- Refusing to recognize the union as bargaining agent for retired members.
- Demanding over IUE objections that the union change the bargaining unit—a nonmandatory subject of negotiations.

Judges Irving R. Kaufman and Sterry R. Waterman of the 2nd Circuit agreed that GE's 1960 bargaining method violated the law requiring it to bargain in good faith. Judge Henry J. Friendly dissented in part and concurred in part.

"We hold," Judge Kaufman wrote, "that an employer may not so combine 'take-it-or-leave-it' bargaining methods with a widely publicized stance of unbending firmness that he is . . . unable to alter a position once taken."

The court said GE had ignored the "legitimacy and relevance" of the union's position as the legal bargaining agent of its members at GE.

He faulted management's "patronizing" attitude and its "unbending patriarchal posture" which he called not consistent with a willingness to discuss union proposals freely and fully, as the law requires employers to do.

GE "occasionally took untenable and unreasonable positions and then defended them, with no apparent purpose other than to avoid yielding to the union," the court wrote.

The decision criticized GE's strategy and gave these guidelines for lawful employer-employe communications:

"We do not hold that an employer may not communicate with his employes during negotiations.

"Nor are we deciding that the 'best-offer-first' bargaining technique is forbidden.

"We do not require an employer to engage in 'auction bargaining' or . . . compel him to make concessions, minor or otherwise."

IUE said Boulware, now retired, was hired by GE in 1947 "to prevent any repetition of the successful 1946 strike" of several cooperating unions.

NLRB examiner Arthur Leff, who ruled GE guilty of unfair practices in 1960 contract talks, issued a report noting that GE looks on genuine collective bargaining as "ask-and-bid" or "auction" bargaining of a "flea-bitten Eastern type of cunning and dishonest bargaining."

The GE system consists of a study in which GE determines what is "right" for its employes; an offer including everything that GE has "found to be warranted," and refusal to make any meaningful changes even at the cost of a strike.

After the company's offer is presented, Leff found, "the flow of communications" to employes "reaches flood proportions."

GE has fashioned an elaborate employe communications system including plant newspapers, daily news digests, employe bulletins, letters to employe homes, television and radio broadcasts and other media, as well as personal contacts to "sell" GE's point of view to workers regardless of union efforts, he said.

NLRB Orders Stevens To Begin Negotiations

of the company's unlawful actions since 1963, when it began signing up new-member applications in Stevens' North and South Carolina plants. Not a single plant has been organized nor a single contract won because of management's refusal to abide by the law, TWUA has pointed out.

An NLRB panel comprising Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and members Gerald A. Brown and Sam Zagoria signed an order approving the June 6 findings of Trial Examiner Robert E. Mullin.

Mullin found after hearing testimony that the union began organizing at the Gulistan plant in Georgia in January 1968, and had by Mar. 18 of that year obtained a valid majority of signed cards authorizing it to represent Stevens employes.

The management refused to recognize the union's majority and insisted on an election. Then it launched a campaign of intimidation, and the union lost the NLRB election. The result was set aside because of management's refusal to provide a list of employe names and addresses, and other unlawful acts.

The examiner found that "every level" of Stevens' supervisory hierarchy was "involved in numerous and continued acts of interference."

He ruled that its demand for an election was "motivated not by a good-faith doubt" of the union's majority but rather "by a rejection of the collective bargaining principle and by a desire to gain time within which to destroy the union's majority."

Mullin also reported three union adherents were fired on pretexts and one job applicant was barred because she was related to a union supporter. All four were ruled entitled to a job and their backpay.

NLRB members said the hearing record "reveals that, upon learning of the presence of the union" at the Gulistan plant, Stevens "resorted to a campaign of extensive and egregious unfair labor practices" which "were calculated to, and in fact did dissipate" TWUA's majority. Since a fair and free election now would be "improbable if not impossible," the NLRB issued its order that Stevens must bargain collectively.

Meany Links Inflation to High Profits

ing to offset the rise in living costs and "to gain some advance in the standard of living." If such objectives are not reached a continuing rise in living costs puts real earnings further behind.

Pres. Nixon had written the nation's business and labor leaders on the threat of inflation, calling specifically on labor leaders to "base their wage demands on the new prospect of a return toward price stability."

He keyed this to his radio talk to the nation in which he said government programs to cool off the economy and slow price increases are taking hold and now need the help of business and labor.

Showdown with GE

GENERAL ELECTRIC CO. has succeeded in forcing its workers to strike. It will not succeed in its efforts to destroy their unity, their unions and their spirit.

GE, which advertises that "progress is our most important product," has the most antiquated concept of labor-management relations of any large American corporation.

It is openly contemptuous of unions, collective bargaining and the concept of negotiations. It seeks to pit union against union, worker against worker. It refuses to recognize the legitimate needs of its employes, their right to help determine their own economic destiny, their need to protect themselves and their families against the destructive inflation created by the profit policies of GE and other corporations, and most of all, their dignity as free Americans entitled to a voice of their own.

GE expects its employes to weaken, their unions to become divided, the picket lines to crumble and the strike to be broken.

GE is absolutely wrong.

THIS IS A STRIKE of the trade union movement. It is a strike we will not lose. It is a strike that has the complete, whole-hearted, determined support of the AFL-CIO.

The eighth constitutional convention of the AFL-CIO pledged such support to the General Electric workers in the event they were forced to strike. Today we redeem that pledge.

As a first step, the Executive Council authorizes the president of the AFL-CIO to name a special three-man committee of this council to mobilize the financial resources the unions will need to weather the battle ahead.

This committee is instructed to meet with the unions involved, determine their financial needs that cannot be met by their own resources, map out and implement a campaign to raise all necessary funds and disperse these funds in an equitable manner.

We intend to help the GE strikers win.

GE's management, stockholders and customers should heed this warning:

The only thing that will end the strike against GE is a decent, honorable, realistic contract.

Statement adopted by AFL-CIO Executive Council Washington, D.C., Oct. 29, 1969.

'The Gravest Doubts'

A LINK between the continued, notorious violations of the nation's labor laws by J. P. Stevens & Co. and the nomination of Judge Haynsworth to the Supreme Court has been traced by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.) in the Congressional Record.

Thompson notes that Haynsworth has said he wouldn't sit on a case involving J. P. Stevens because he holds a substantial amount of stock in the company and it was a principal client of his before he went on the federal bench. Thompson then comments:

"I think it is nice that Judge Haynsworth does not seem to have sat on any cases involving Stevens itself, but he has sat on cases of vital importance to the whole textile industry, such as the famous Darlington case. And I find it disturbing that a federal judge has chosen throughout his judicial career to hold stock in a company which habitually and flagrantly violates the National Labor Relations Act as a deliberate corporate policy.

"That sort of association raises the gravest doubts in my mind whether Judge Haynsworth is capable of enforcing the nation's labor relations laws fairly and impartially."

A Word Edgewise:

U.S. Opened Door to Peace, But Hanoi Balked at Entering

By John P. Roche

FROM THE TIME that things heated up in Viet Nam—roughly the spring and summer of 1965—leading voices in the liberal community weighed in against Pres. Johnson with two demands: "Stop the Bombing" and "Start Negotiating." The two were generally linked, with a strong insinuation that the bombing halt would in itself bring Hanoi to the table, sincerely prepared to work out a "political solution."

Some of us, recalling the effective way the Communists have employed negotiations as a weapons-system, dissented from this simplistic view, not because we necessarily supported the bombing of North Viet Nam, but because we felt that bombing was irrelevant. If Ho Chi Minh had believed that negotiation was in his interest, he would have gone to the conference table as bombs came down his chimney.

It is hard now to recreate the passionate atmosphere that surrounded the question of bombing. Pres. Johnson first cut it back and later stopped it entirely. This brought an initial wave of enthusiasm from the liberals. On Oct. 30, 1968, Sen. Edward Kennedy applauded the President's decision and went on to say: "The spokesmen for North Viet Nam have constantly stressed that an end to the bombing would result in real, meaningful negotiations in Paris. It is now time for them to prove by their actions the sincerity of their words."

Sen. Frank Church was equally warm: "The door to peace in Viet Nam has been opened. It is now up to Hanoi to walk through it." And Sen. George McGovern noted that the decision would hopefully bring "the other side [to] respond by steps to begin bringing this tragic conflict to an early end."

Ho Chi Minh, alas, did not walk through any open doors. The negotiations in Paris remained a frozen quadrille because, once the bombing had been stopped, Hanoi predictably upped the ante and demanded the destruction of the Saigon government as a precondition to genuine negotiations—as well as the complete withdrawal of American troops.

To put it bluntly, Hanoi asked for American capitulation as a precondition for discussing the future of South Viet Nam. There was nothing particularly new about this. One of their spokesmen in 1967 had been quoted by intelligence sources as sardonically telling a foreign government that the one negotiable issue was whether the American troops wanted to leave on a red carpet, or have the route strewn with roses. They were and are a tough bunch and they knew exactly what they wanted.

In any normal universe, Hanoi's double-cross would have infuriated Senators Kennedy, Church, McGovern, et al, who had made it an article of faith that a bombing halt would bring productive negotiations. One might have expected them to rise in the Senate and denounce Hanoi's perfidy.

Instead, they turned their guns on the Nixon Administration and began insisting on Hanoi's new preconditions: "coalition government" and "withdrawal." "Stop the bombing and start negotiating" has, in effect, been replaced by a new formula: "Stop negotiating and get out."

THIS CHANGE of stance is, of course, reflected in the commentaries: columnist Joseph Kraft, for example, argued last March that he did not doubt "that in time, the [National Liberation] Front will talk with the 'warlords' of Saigon." Recently, in contrast, he flatly agreed that "Hanoi could not be induced to make any concessions so long as they implied recognition of the authority of the Saigon government."

Paradoxically then, those of us who formerly spent much of our energy opposing the hard hawks with their demand for a "military solution," now find ourselves flanked on the left by opponents of a meaningful "political solution" who are doing everything in their power to frustrate genuine negotiations. They were wrong about the consequences of a bombing halt, and in my judgment they are even wronger now. Nobody ever expects a politician to admit that he has been played for a patsy, but isn't a period of silence in order?

Where The Action Is:

Youth Participation in Unions Seen Bridging Generation Gap

The following is excerpted from "Youth and Labor," an article by Walter G. Davis, director, AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, in the October 1969 American Federationist.

I PARTICIPATED this summer in a series of consultations on the problems of young workers following the International Labor Organization's 50th anniversary conference in Geneva, Switzerland.

"The massive presence of youth in the societies of today gives to youth issues a potential importance which compels attention," one ILO panelist said in a background paper.

He stated the problem this way: children and adolescents represent about 54 percent of the world population; three-fourths of them live in developing regions in Africa, Asia and Latin America, with 40 percent of the respective populations under age 15.

With respect to the work force, the "massive presence" of youth was found to be no less impressive. By 1970, there will be 230 million workers below 20 years of age and another 211 million between the ages of 20 and 24. By 1980, it is estimated that the figures will have increased to 245 million below age 20 and 264 million between 20 and 24.

After the statistical and quantitative analysis was completed, the ILO panel got down to the more difficult—the qualitative aspects of the phenomenon. For several years in the developed countries, certain groups of adolescents and young adults have tended to stay out of the classical social institutions where their parents, when young, found a place in society and undertook preparations for adult life. It also recognized that the family itself, long considered the basic social unit, has lost its close-knit influence on young people, who more and more go outside this shelter to seek a point of reference, and perhaps also "relevance" and "solidarity."

"Youth movements of long standing, political parties and trade unions have to make special efforts to renew their membership and leadership with young people," the ILO panel counseled.

At the ILO conference, much discussion among the delegates centered on the need to establish "youth wings" to the trade union movement and political parties.

The AFL-CIO does not consider this step necessary. The everyday experience of working, earning, learning and living in America tends to add maturity and experience to young workers. These on-the-job experiences will eventually bring those in unionized industries into the mainstream of the trade union movement. Even if experience does not put them into the political and social movements associated with trade unionism, then off-the-job forces of community interests may. And in either case, events do happen which turn non-experience into experience, inducing a realization and appreciation of what unionism means and is all about.

In the meantime, rather than segregate young workers from older trade unionists, the AFL-CIO will rely on programs emphasizing two-way communication and active participation. It is apparent from listening to young trade unionists and observing their behavior that they certainly do not want a side show separate from the main action of building the union.

It is apparent that they can see and are sensitive to the injustices in our society. Beside the problem of color, these young people can see the two communities, one affluent and the other deprived or barely able to make ends meet in day-to-day living. Given the opportunity, they will talk about these injustices and our system of national priorities and programs necessary to eliminate them. Once they have the facts, they will also do something about them.

In short, they want to bring about changes necessary for the fulfillment of peace, prosperity, security and dignity of the individual for each and every citizen of the nation and of the world.

They want absolute truth about things as they are, but also they demand a change for the better.

There is nothing wrong with this, except that they overlook the essence of compromise for the good of all.

Their noisy reaction to or silent withdrawal from the mainstream of American life, whether it is conducted within the confines of a job, trade union, college or community, is principally because they believe they can't get older Americans and those who hold the power to even listen to them, let alone permit them to do anything about making changes.

It is apparent they want to participate in this adult world, with all its imperfections. The quickest way for them therefore may very well be to broaden the opportunities for expression of new ideas designed to bring about such change.

THE AMERICAN LABOR movement has been doing this for a long time now and its leaders and members, including the young members, are seeking essentially the same goals. By living, striving and working together, rather than apart, these goals can be achieved. This is why the AFL-CIO has not considered building a separate room for the young in the house of labor.

Looked at in this way, the impact of youth on the labor movement is not a problem. It is, on the contrary, an opportunity to expose and eliminate institutionalized hypocrisy, put national priorities in their right order and implement the economic, political and social programs to cure the nation's maladies.

Rather than treat young trade unionists in a separatist way, it would seem to be more creditable and productive to engage them in the activities of a wide range of existing union programs such as collective bargaining workshops, organizing conferences, community services and political action. Hence, the means to involve and invite them into the trade union and community mainstreams are already available at the local union, international union, central body and federation levels.

Public Response Needed:

Special Interest Lobbies Attack Tax Reform Measure in Senate

MANY KEY REFORMS of the House-passed tax measure now before the Senate Finance Committee are being wrecked or weakened by special interest lobbyists, labor economist Nat Goldfinger charged.

"The oil people, the Wall Street investment houses and others are on Capitol Hill in droves these days, working to preserve their own special loopholes," declared Goldfinger, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

"The members of the U.S. Senate have to hear from not only trade union members, but from the general public back home, too," he stressed.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, Goldfinger said that tax-free state and municipal bonds, oil depletion allowances and the capital gains loophole are among the areas where major reform is needed to head off loss of public confidence in the federal tax structure.

Goldfinger agreed with the revelation made on the broadcast that the oft-cited figure of 155 "zero taxpayers with adjusted gross income of over $200,000 is grossly understated." He pointed out that since much of the exempt income is not even listed on tax returns, "$20 billion . . . or maybe quite a bit more . . . is not reported at all."

EXEMPTION OF INTEREST payments on state and local bonds is "a key loophole of special privilege for wealthy families and the banks," he asserted. He labeled as "shameful," the Senate committee's restoration of the tax-free status that the House-passed bill would end.

"The oil industry," Goldfinger declared, "should be treated like any other, in terms of the right to depreciate their property—it should not be given the special privilege of depletion allowances." He said that the AFL-CIO is "willing to support, as the first step" toward eventual elimination of the loophole, reduction of the present 27 percent allowance to 20 percent.

A NATIONAL HEALTH INSURANCE program, designed to cover most if not all Americans, has emerged from a dream to a possibility.

The popularity and fundamental soundness of Medicare and Medicaid, despite the milking of its finances by some doctors, hospitals and nursing homes, can be credited with almost a complete reversal of once heavy opposition to national health insurance.

Another contributing factor is that the American Medical Association, chief opponent of national health insurance—and Medicare before—is being pretty thoroughly discredited on the public side of the ledger. Beyond this, though, there has been a growing consensus around the country that medical coverage for all citizens makes good sense.

According to the latest available statistics—1967—175.8 million citizens were under 65. Of these, 15.5 percent of the under-65 group had no hospital insurance, 22 percent had no surgical insurance, 37 percent had no in-the-hospital medical expense insurance, 49 percent had no insurance to cover X-ray and laboratory examinations when not in the hospital, 60 percent had no insurance for visits to doctors' offices or doctor visits to their home, 64 percent had no insurance against the cost of prescribed drugs and 97 percent had no insurance against dental expenses.

Under-65 citizens obviously have seen some of the advantages won by our elderly citizens and feel that they should be entitled to some relief from the often back-breaking burden of medical bills.

As early as 1935, proposals were put forward in Congress for a form of national health insurance. Many members urged that it be incorporated as part of the social security legislation. However, it failed to pass either chamber.

Pres. Roosevelt in 1935 sent to the Congress the report of his Committee on Economic Security, endorsing national health insurance to be financed by a payroll tax. The President did not endorse the plan at the time but called for further study. In later messages to Congress, Roosevelt discussed the "right to adequate medical care" but did not make any formal recommendations.

It was on Nov. 19, 1945 that Pres. Truman made history by proposing to Congress a comprehensive, prepaid medical insurance plan for persons of all ages to be financed through a 4 percent rise in the Social Security Old-Age & Survivors Insurance tax.

For the next five years this was a steamy issue in Washington and throughout the country. The AMA, through the public relations firm of Whittaker & Baxter, coined the term "socialized medicine."

THE NEWS MEDIA of the country generally threw their influence in the direction of the AMA, the drug lobby, Chamber of Commerce and similar groups, helping to defeat the proposal.

As early as 1952, proponents decided to take a new approach: medical care for the elderly. Among the pioneers were Rep. Aime Forand (D-R.I.), Sen. John F. Kennedy (D-Mass.), Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N.M.) and Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.), father of the incumbent congressman.

It took laborious efforts, piecemeal gains and setbacks until finally in July 1966, Medicare became a reality.

Today, more than three years later the earlier supporters of national health insurance—organized labor, liberal organizations, consumer groups, social workers, liberal doctors—are now finding many allies.

The recent Colorado Governors' Conference approved a national health insurance plan with little opposition. The American Hospital Association is studying a plan.

Sen. Abraham Ribicoff (D-Conn.), is proposing legislation to establish a council of health advisers appointed by the President, to set national health goals and coordinate federal activities.

The present HEW Secretary, Robert H. Finch, has named a special task force to make a feasibility study on a new health insurance plan. A report is expected as early as November.

SPECIAL INTEREST LOBBYISTS are sinking or weakening many of the key reforms in the House-passed tax bill now before the Senate Finance Committee, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger, center, warned on Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on Mutual radio. Questioning him were Eileen Shanahan of the New York Times and Lee Cohn of the Washington Evening Star.

Georgia Labor Campaigns for Minimum Wage

Savannah, Ga. — The Georgia AFL-CIO stressed an all-out effort to win passage of a $1.25 an hour minimum wage bill to be considered by the state legislature next year.

The 13th convention of the state labor body went on record in urging the governor and the state assembly in establishing the wage floor to cover all workers in Georgia, including employes of state and local governments, and business and industry not involved in interstate commerce.

The three-day convention also urged the state legislature to assure public employes the same rights as workers in industry throughout the state in being able to participate in collective bargaining with their employers.

State AFL-CIO Pres. J. O. Moore called for a major registration campaign for the 1970 state elections. The campaign will be taken into each of the 159 counties of the state, Moore said.

In other resolutions, the convention urged:

- A $20 increase in the maximum workmen's compensation to $70 a week.
- Establishing two $500 scholarships starting in 1971 in memory of the late state labor leader, W. H. Montague, Sr.
- Repeal of the state garnishment law.

The convention also added support to the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee grape boycott and called on all union locals within the state to contribute $10 a month to a UFWOC assistance fund.

Piano Tariffs Pressed To Curb Job Erosion

Rising imports of pianos into the United States as tariffs taper off are destroying an increasing number of jobs for Americans, the Furniture Workers and a council of unions in the piano industry told the U.S. Tariff Commission.

In the past decade, more than 3,600 jobs have been lost by the effect the imports have played on the domestic production of pianos, Sec.-Treas. Fred Fulford of the Furniture Workers said.

Tariffs have been trimmed continually in the past several years, allowing a greater influx of pianos from foreign countries, he noted.

Fulford supported a piano manufacturers association plea in asking the Tariff Commission to reinstate a 40 percent duty on imports. The tariff is now less than 14 percent and is scheduled to drop to 8.5 percent on Jan. 1, 1972.

Pleas before the commission traced the rise in imports directly to the lowered duty rates. This has had an adverse effect on U.S. piano manufacturing, the commission was told.

Fulford singled out the imports from Japan which have captured 10 percent of the U.S. domestic market. He noted that Japanese imports have increased 360 percent since 1964.

"The tragic implication of these statistics is revealed in a contrast of the average wage paid to production workers in the Japanese piano industry—77 cents an hour, compared with $3.01 for U.S. workers," he said.

While American manufacturers find themselves unable to compete with the lower prices offered by the Japanese, Fulford observed, more U.S. workers are losing their jobs.

"If the Tariff Commission does not act to put a brake on the rapidly increasing piano import trade, it must take responsibility for the loss of American jobs and the destruction of an important factor in the contributions of America to the culture of the world," Fulford warned.

The National Piano, Organ & Musical Instruments Council, which joined the Furniture Workers in the petition for higher import tariffs, includes eight AFL-CIO affiliates: Allied Industrial Workers, Carpenters, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Furniture Workers, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Rubber Workers and Steelworkers.

Radiation Standards Proposed on Color TV

A move to establish standards for the maximum level of hazardous radiation emitted by color television sets was initiated by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

The HEW proposal, published in Federal Register, would affect TV sets manufactured after Jan. 1. It is expected to be the first standard issued under the Radiation Control for Health & Safety Act.

The standard would limit X-ray emission to a maximum of 0.5 milliroentgens per hour at a distance of about two inches from any external surface of the set.

Alternatives Pressed:

Administration Hit On Economic Front

AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger called on the Administration to alter its economic policies of "severe restraint" and "get at the guts of what is troubling the American economy."

The present course, he told labor leaders attending a conference in Washington, "means an inevitable rise in unemployment," inequitable burdens on workers and leads the nation nearer and nearer to a recession.

Two other main conference speakers—economist Leon H. Keyserling and Rep. William D. Ford (D-Mich.)—agreed that the Administration is fighting inflation in the wrong way.

The all-day meeting, attended by nearly 150 union representatives from the District of Columbia, Maryland, West Virginia and Virginia, was co-sponsored by the Labor Studies Center of American University and the AFL-CIO Greater Washington Central Labor Council. Three state central bodies also cooperated in arranging the conference on government economic policy.

Goldfinger denounced Administration policies of trying to slow the economy through "the highest interest rates in 100 years," a 75 percent reduction in federal construction and sharp cutbacks in "essential" social programs.

This "squeeze," he warned, has virtually halted housing construction, has "locked people" in at high-interest purchases for years to come, is stifling small business and causing a steady increase in unemployment.

The Administration's steps, "all in the name of fighting inflation," are not successful because they do not get at the causes of inflation, Goldfinger said.

What is needed, he said, is a large volume of construction; a rollback in interest rates; repeal of the business investment tax credit; selective action against items that are going up in price, particularly services; and curbs on excessive profits.

Keyserling, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisors under Pres. Truman, emphasized, as did Goldfinger, that tax reform also is vital to successfully controlling inflation.

The economy must not be "restricted but expanded," Keyserling declared, "so that all of the nation's people will have a share in it." He called for an expanded housing program as the key to a stronger economy.

Ford lashed the Administration for its "insensitivity" to the dynamics of the nation's economy and its needs in terms of jobs, housing, educational opportunities, better health and "many other social consequences."

He attacked Treasury Sec. David M. Kennedy's recent willingness to accept a 4 percent rate of unemployment as "showing very little understanding of what it's like to be part of that 4 percent and little understanding of the remaining 96 percent who are affected."

Ford also denounced members of Congress who are holding up social programs and trying to block tax reform. "We have entirely too many people in this town who have no understanding of human needs and human suffering," he concluded.

$2.50 an Hour Wage Urged in New Hampshire

Bedford, N.H.—The New Hampshire AFL-CIO called on both state and federal governments to raise the minimum wage to $2.50 an hour—and cover all workers.

Delegates to the 13th convention of the state labor council also voted to open a campaign against proposed tax increases that will be considered at a special session of the legislature.

Another convention statement urged the federal government to establish firm controls on imports of footwear, textiles and apparel. The growing tide of imports is wiping out workers' jobs, the convention warned.

Other resolutions called for occupational health and safety standards, a federal workmen's compensation system and a broad range of consumer protection measures.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Thomas J. Pitarys announced a plan to launch a mail campaign in an effort to reach unorganized workers who are interested in joining unions.

Pitarys was re-elected to a 12th term as president of the state body. Other top officers re-elected were Executive Vice Pres. Joseph Moriarty and Sec.-Treas. Saverio M. Giambalvo.

Two new vice presidents were elected to the 21-member executive council. They are Andre E. Courtemanche and Ernest A. Record.

Political Action Stressed At Florida Convention

Jacksonville—The Florida State AFL-CIO adopted programs at its 13th annual convention keyed to the convention theme: building political and industrial democracy.

Delegates to the four-day parley attended political education workshops conducted by Daniel A. Powell, AFL-CIO area COPE director, and established a state labor committee on urban affairs and community problems. They set the state body's sights on improvements in job safety laws, Medicare and Medicaid programs, unemployment and accident insurance, and other legislation

The convention called on the state Dept. of Education to improve training opportunities in the vocational education field. It urged the same department to help train union officials at all levels within the state's education system, and to provide university training for union members leading to a degree in labor-management relations.

Re-elected without opposition for a four-year term were Pres. Charlie Harris and Vice Pres. Art Hallgren, Miami, along with Sec.-Treas. William E. Allen, Tampa.

Nine vice presidents were returned to office, and these new board members were elected: Donald Watts, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; James Deaton, Transit Union; Eugene Long, Plumbers; Elma Jones and Lester Chester, Carpenters; James Phillips, Communications Workers, and Lee Fornari, United Transportation Union.

Convention speakers included Stanton Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of state and city central bodies; Rep. Claude Pepper and Rep. Sam Gibbons, Florida Democrats; Assistant Labor Sec. William Usery, Jr., and Broward Williams, state treasurer and insurance commissioner.

After adjournment, the new executive board began examining a proposed cooperative program for improved auto liability insurance at a reduced cost. Recommendations will be announced after a study, the officers said.

Affiliations Barred To Chemical Union

The Chemical Workers are no longer eligible for membership or participation in the AFL-CIO's state and local central bodies, or in the federation's departments.

The union's charter was revoked by the AFL-CIO convention on Oct. 3 because of the Chemical Workers' affiliation with the Alliance for Labor Action.

In sending the formal notification of the convention's action to state and local labor councils, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called attention to the mandatory provisions of Article IV, Sec. 6, of the AFL-CIO constitution.

Under this section, Meany said, "the International Chemical Workers Union shall no longer, while it remains suspended, be allowed representation or recognition in any AFL-CIO trade or industrial department or state or local central body."

Kansas AFL-CIO Drafts Voter Registration Plan

Topeka—The Kansas State AFL-CIO, by unanimous vote of some 375 delegates from 400 locals, launched a new venture in voter registration by authorizing an intensive check of members in five pilot cities.

The convention agreed to cooperate in the registration drive in Kansas City, Leavensworth, Pittsburg, Salina and Wichita, with particular stress on union members who own their own homes.

Central body members in those areas will check deed and mortgage records as an experimental way of setting up master registration lists on the theory that homeowners are more likely to be voters than transient workers.

"But we will not overlook other members," said Sec.-Treas. F. E. Black. "A permanent registration list will make things easier for get-out-the-vote committees in future. The homeowner check is just one of the approaches we will use."

The convention returned Pres. Carl Courter, Vice Pres. James Yount and Black for four-year terms, and elected 16 board members, including two new ones—Howard Hoy of the Meat Cutters, Wichita, and Jack Murray of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, Kansas City.

The delegates voted to raise the per capita levy on locals from 15 cents a member per month to 20 cents effective next Jan. 1.

For Shoe Workers:

Union Rights Urged At ILO Conference

Geneva—A 25-nation conference sponsored by the International Labor Organization proclaimed the "paramount importance" of unfettered trade union rights for leather and shoe workers.

Employer and government delegates joined trade union spokesmen in adopting unanimously a resolution recognizing that the "free exercise" of trade union rights was essential for "improving wages and other conditions of work in the leather and footwear industry everywhere in the world."

The two-week session was the first such three-cornered international conference ever held to focus exclusively on this industry's labor and social problems.

Particular stress on the key role of collective bargaining was voiced throughout the discussions by the U.S. worker delegation formed by Finelo De Novellis, vice president of the United Shoe Workers, and Leo Frieda, vice president of the Boot & Shoe Workers.

The conference itself singled out the special significance of collective bargaining for labor when it recalled the "absolute necessity" for the ILO to intensify its efforts for the "defense of freedom of association and trade union rights."

Addressing the conference on behalf of both U.S. worker representatives, Frieda noted the progress achieved in the industry but said that "more has to be done collectively with all nations in order to achieve a higher standard of living for the workers."

Frieda expressed concern at the growing share of the U.S. market being captured by foreign shoe manufacturers. This threat to the U.S. industry is due "primarily to the substantially lower wages received by foreign shoe workers," he said.

"For all shoe workers," he continued, "we believe that improved production technology should bring reduced hours of work and a sharing in the benefits."

De Novellis who served as worker vice chairman of a committee dealing with the impact of technological developments, termed the conference "very constructive" when commenting privately on the session.

It had served, he said, to underscore the "enormous difference between countries," but the delegates had shown themselves to be "open-minded and anxious to understand our position."

In its conclusions the conference urged that the technological developments be used to improve the industry's attractiveness to workers. This could be done, it found, by "applying a share of the benefits of higher productivity to raising wages and improving conditions of employment."

Attention could also be given to the overcoming of such industry "drawbacks" as noise, humidity, smells and nervous tensions.

Conclusions on employment questions that were drafted by a committee on which Frieda served were also unanimously adopted by the conference.

They called for the encouraging of the development of collective bargaining, more particularly in the young countries now beginning to industrialize, as a means of "improving conditions of employment."

Both women and young people should be remunerated on the basis of equal pay for equal work by the removal of all causes of "discrimination in employment, job classification and promotion," it was stated.

A five-day 40-hour week was upheld as a "desirable standard" everywhere in the leather and shoe industry. Wherever these hours are exceeded, the workweek should be progressively reduced to the extent permitted by economic and technological conditions and without loss of pay, the conference ruled.

CIVIL RIGHTS COMMITTEE of Aluminum Workers Local 205 convenes for its organizational meeting in Baton Rouge, La. The newly-formed committee was appointed by the union's executive council to resolve civil rights problems for workers. Seated from left are A. J. Burrell, Chairman John F. Robertson and John Henry Shipes. Standing: John Carter, J. W. Comeaux, Robert Square and Avery Joseph.

Education Funds Sought To Spur Desegregation

ranks in importance with its 1954 decision that segregated schools are unconstitutional and a 1955 edict that desegregation proceed with all deliberate speed.

What the court now makes clear is that "continued operation of segregated schools under a standard of allowing 'all deliberate speed' is no longer constitutionally permissible."

The decision, in a case involving 33 Mississippi school districts, also is a sharp rebuke to the Administration policy of going to court in the South to seek further delays in school desegregation.

The Mississippi districts previously had been ordered by the U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals to desegregate by Aug. 25, 1969. The court also asked the federal government to adopt desegregation plans for the districts.

However, after formulating desegregation plans for the districts, the Health, Education & Welfare Dept. suddenly withdrew them on Aug. 20. Instead, it asked for and got the Appeals Court to grant the districts another three-month delay.

In vacating the latest Appeals Court action, the Supreme Court ordered it to "immediately declare that each of the school districts here involved may no longer operate a dual system based on race or color."

All requests for delay should have been denied by the lower court, the Supreme Court said, "because continued operation of segregated schools under a standard of allowing 'all deliberate speed' for desegregation is no longer constitutionally permissible."

End Dual Systems

"Under explicit holdings of this court," the opinion continued, "the obligation of every school district is to terminate dual school systems at once and to operate now and hereafter only unitary schools."

Meany recalled that when the court first acted on school integration in 1954 "it had the unanimous support" of labor. "Today," he said, "we reiterate that support with a greater sense of urgency because we are acutely aware of all the lost years."

He noted that in 1954 the AFL Executive Council urged a big investment in federal funds for education to prevent any state from claiming a lack of money "to excuse its failure to provide the necessary facilities" for school integration.

Funds Needed

"Today," Meany continued, "the AFL-CIO revives that proposal. The schools must be desegregated instantly, the court has rightly held. The question of adequate funds cannot be allowed to stop that action."

"We hope," he added, "the Administration will end its resistance to immediate desegregation and join us in urging Congress to promptly provide the necessary funds to make this decision a reality."

The Supreme Court ruling also was applauded by the NAACP Legal Defense & Educational Fund, Inc., which appealed the case on behalf of 14 Negro children in Mississippi.

"We are going to press for (similar) relief in all pending school cases," Jack Greenberg, the fund's director said, voicing hope that the Justice Dept. "will now come into the cases on our side."

Meany Cites Need to Build Free Unions

American labor aids in building free unions around the globe because it knows that "slave labor threatens free labor everywhere," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told graduates of the 28th training program of the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

Also addressing the graduation ceremonies was Robert B. Black, director of social development for the Agency for International Development.

Graduates of the latest AIFLD class—36 union leaders from Brazil and Caribbean nations—bring to nearly 800 the number from Latin America who have completed the course at Front Royal, Va. They, in turn, become instructors in their own countries.

Meany stressed that the course is designed to help those who take it understand U.S. unions, benefit from their experiences, adopt them where possible, but "not necessarily emulate us."

The important thing, Meany said, is that the graduates help build "free labor structures" that will advance the wages and working standards of union members, and thereby strengthen the economies of their countries.

Black said the U.S. government sees the labor movement in Latin America as "perhaps the best system of private organizations who assemble, speak their views and represent their interests in the open societies of their countries."

Labor unions, he added, are "one of the fundamental building blocks in the creation of an effective modern society, along with cooperatives, credit unions, community organizations, and women's and student's groups."

He urged the graduates to equip themselves with the economic facts about their countries and make their voices heard in helping to determine economic policies.

Trades Score Racial Quotas In Hiring Plan

The Administration's racial quota system for hiring minority group members in the Philadelphia building industry is illegal, unworkable, and in conflict with the intent of Congress and the language of a presidential executive order, the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. has charged.

The department "supports the objectives of non-discrimination and affirmative action in the Equal Employment Opportunity program" in deeds as well as words, BCTD Pres. C. J. Haggerty said in a statement presented to the Senate Subcommittee on the Separation of Powers by Louis Sherman, the department's legal counsel.

The statement paralleled a policy declaration of delegates to the department's 55th convention, held in September. That convention agreed unanimously that "we are unalterably opposed to the quota system."

The AFL-CIO convention which followed said the Philadelphia plan "sets up unsound procedures used in no other industry, segment of the labor market or in government itself."

The Philadelphia Revised Plan was issued last June 27 by the Labor Dept. in an order to the heads of all federal procurement agencies. It set quotas or rate ranges which employers bidding on federal contracts must try to achieve in hiring.

Economic Development Stressed To Curb Latin Unemployment

A massive attack on the Western Hemisphere's problem of widespread and increasing unemployment was called for by the Third Inter-American Conference of Labor Ministers in Washington.

The ministers also reaffirmed their support for free trade unions and urged governments in the hemisphere to take steps to strengthen labor participation in economic development.

Other areas of major concern at the meeting were labor's role in the Latin American economic integration movement and advancement of the rights of women workers.

The week-long conference, sponsored by the Organization of American States, was attended by ministers of labor from 23 countries. Most delegations also included union leaders.

The stage for conference action on the jobs issue was set by receipt of an OAS report showing that unemployment reached a 25 percent rate for Latin America in 1960 and "the situation has grown worse since." Experts estimate that the rate is as high as 40 percent in many areas of the hemisphere.

The conference asked governments to incorporate employment policies into national planning programs, set up national councils on human resources and make job plans part of agrarian reform programs.

The ministers appealed to international lending agencies to increase their loans to job-creating projects in Latin America, and in turn demanded that governments develop specific projects to create jobs.

Governments were urged to include labor and manpower experts in delegations to annual reviews of national economies carried out by the Inter-American Committee on the Alliance for Progress.

The committee should make employment policies a basic part of the review it makes of each country, the ministers said.

The conference reiterated a call made by the ministers at a 1966 meeting for government-employer-labor committees in each nation to advance free unions and expand their role in bringing better standards of living.

However, the ministers rejected a proposal from labor delegations that would have made financial assistance to a government conditional on compliance with this recommendation. Governments with anti-labor policies also would have been singled out for rebuke.

The ministers approved for the first time direct, long-term technical assistance to trade union research activities being carried out by OAS. Aid could be granted for up to two years for each research project.

In a major institutional innovation, the ministers made the Trade Union Technical Advisory Committee a permanent organ of their conference. The committee, created temporarily in 1966, is made up of union representatives from OAS member states. Andrew C. McLellan of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs represents the United States on the committee.

The conference called on OAS to provide technical assistance for studies of migration by workers aimed at blunting the movement of "cheap labor" which is exploited by employers.

For the first time, the ministers gave special attention to the problems of women workers by urging governments to set up women's bureaus "to promote the improvement of women's economic, social and cultural situations."

They asked that the OAS help underwrite a seminar on the participation of women in trade unions.

Congress Pace Quickens:

House Prods Education Aid, Votes Strong Mine Safety Bill

The House voted to step up the flow of federal aid to the nation's schools, overruling objections both from the Administration and its own Appropriations Committee.

The move had been urged by a coalition of education and labor groups as a means of overcoming a legislative logjam that has caused school aid funds to be frozen at a level below that of last year.

In another area, the House overwhelmingly approved a strong, labor-supported coal mine safety and health bill despite opposition from employer groups which said it would be too costly. The Senate has already approved similar legislation and a House-Senate conference committee will work out the final version.

The 389-4 vote for passage of the mine safety bill reflected public opinion aroused by a series of mine disasters and disclosure of the extent of "black lung" disease and death from coal dust inhalation.

The vote was a closer 177-124 on the education funding issue. But it added up to an impressive demonstration of the support for more federal aid because the House tossed aside long-standing precedent and rebuffed a compromise proposal.

Here is how the situation developed:

The President's budget for the fiscal year that began July 1 asked $200 million less in federal aid to education than was appropriated last year.

The House, last July 31, rebelled and voted $1 billion more for school aid programs than the President had sought.

The Senate has not yet acted on this appropriations bill, which also contained funds for the Labor Dept. and the rest of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

When appropriations bills aren't passed by the start of the fiscal year, Congress adopts, what is termed a "continuing resolution," which has to be renewed from time to time. As is customary, the last such resolution—which has now expired—allowed government agencies to spend either at the level of the previous year's appropriations or at the amount requested in the new budget—whichever is lower. In the case of education aid, this meant that schools have been receiving less money than they did last year.

The Appropriations Committee proposed a new continuing resolution allowing school aid spending at either last year's level or that of the House-passed appropriation bill—whichever was lower for each program.

School aid supporters—bucking the leadership of both parties—rallied behind a motion by Rep. Jeffrey Cohelan (D-Calif.) to amend the continuing resolution to allow federal aid payments to rise to the level voted by the House last July.

It is now up to the Senate to decide whether to go along with the House action or stick to past precedent. Even if approved, however, Congress can not compel the Administration to spend the additional funds. But city and state school systems across the country have warned that they face a major crisis unless additional federal funds are made available.

On the mine safety legislation, the House was virtually unanimous.

Coal Dust Standards

Both the House and Senate mine safety bills would immediately reduce the coal dust concentration to 4.5 milligrams per cubic meter of air, with a further reduction to 3 mg. in six months. This is the level recommended as an interim standard by the U.S. Public Health Service—and the industry complained that the cost of needed ventilation systems would require some mines to close.

The Senate bill would require a further reduction to a 2 mg. level within six years.

Both bills also provide federal compensation for miners afflicted with the incurable black lung disease—the House measure somewhat more generously than the Senate bill.

A number of specific safety requirements are written into both bills, dealing with such matters as spark-proof machinery and linkage devices for mine trains which haul coal from the pits.

Nixon Updates Order On U.S. Labor Policy

1962 order that at least 60 percent of the eligible employes must vote in order for the election to be valid.

The order does clarify the status of supervisors, who can belong to general membership unions but cannot be bargained for.

The new regulations also include procedures and rules governing internal union affairs comparable to provisions of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

The new Federal Labor Relations Council will be made up of the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, the Secretary of Labor and an official in the President's Executive Office. The President may appoint other officials in the Executive Branch to the council.

Elections and other matters to be decided under the order will be handled by the Assistant Secretary of Labor for Labor-Management Relations.

The new order—No. 11491—will become effective Jan. 1, 1970.

The report and recommendations to the President on which the order was based was made by Labor Sec. George P. Shultz, Defense Sec. Melvin R. Laird, Civil Service Commission Chairman Robert E. Hampton and Robert P. Mayo, director, Bureau of the Budget.

They noted that the Kennedy order in 1962 "produced some excellent results, beneficial to both agencies and employes."

They noted also the growth of union representation in the seven years, which exclusive union recognition growing to 2,305 units in 35 agencies covering 1,416,073 employes—52 percent of the total federal work force subject to the order.

The AFL-CIO and its federal employe unions all have called for updating and improvement of the Kennedy order in important respect and testified before a special presidential commission last year on needed changes.

House Votes 339-9 for Extending Housing, Urban Renewal Projects

The House has approved legislation to expand the nation's housing programs substantially beyond the Administration's recommendations.

The bill was marred, however, by an amendment that unions warned could be used to undercut work rules negotiated through collective bargaining.

By a 339-9 vote, the House authorized $4.9 billion to extend existing housing and urban programs for one year. The Senate earlier passed a two-year extension measure authorizing $6.2 billion.

Both bills deal with funds designated for urban renewal, model cities, public housing for the elderly, home ownership and rental assistance for the poor and other programs.

Differences in the provisions of the two bills will have to be ironed out by a conference committee.

The House bill was amended to extend the authority of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development and the Veterans Administration to raise interest rates on FHA and VA mortgages above the legal limit for a year instead of a three-month limitation set in committee. The Senate extended the authority for six months.

The House bill contains a $1.5 billion authorization with which the Government National Mortgage Corp. can finance low-cost FHA and VA mortgages. The Senate bill has no such provision.

Just prior to passage, the House approved an amendment to require an urban project to include as many units of low- and middle-income housing as the area had when it was a slum. There is no similar provision in the Senate bill.

On the other hand, the Senate measure has a feature not found in the House bill. It extends rent subsidies to public housing. At present, these subsidies are allowed only to low-income families living in privately-built apartments.

Rep. John B. Anderson (R-Ill.) introduced an amendment to the House bill that would specify there be "no inhibition by contract or practice" against techniques, work methods or materials that would lower the cost of a housing project.

The AFL-CIO warned that the amendment, put into the Senate bill by Sen. John G. Tower (R-Tex.), could be used to destroy union work rules reached through bargaining.

However, before the House adopted the amendment, it was changed to apply only to "operation breakthrough" projects in HUD—a group of experimental projects to be conducted under the model cities program.

Senate Panel Reopens Loopholes in Tax Bill

The Senate Finance Committee has restored what a House tax bill proposed eliminating—hundreds of millions of dollars in tax loopholes for businesses, banks and millionaires.

Having completed its work on the loophole-closing sections of the House bill, the committee turned its attention to the measure's tax relief sections.

Although no exact figures were immediately available, one calculation showed the committee stripped more than $500 million in proposed annual new revenue from the House bill.

More important than the amount, however, was the fact that the reduced revenue was the result of the committee's weakening of sections dealing with capital gains, the oil industry, banks and stock market investors.

The AFL-CIO had called for strengthening the House bill. But the Senate committee's actions reflected the influence of what AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller termed "an army of special interest lobbyists."

The Wall Street Journal reported that "some committee sources contend that these lobbyists have, in effect, written the main sections of the bill applying to them."

Most of the loss of revenue from the House bill comes from the Senate panel's watering down of a stiffer capital gains tax, restoration of tax-exempt interest on municipal bonds, a smaller cut in the tax-free oil depletion allowance, and continuation of a padded "bad debt" tax-free reserve for banks.

On the plus side, the committee kept the maximum tax rate where it now is instead of reducing it to 50 percent as the House proposed.

The committee also rejected a House provision that would have extended present "income-averaging" to capital gains, wagering and gift income; and it improved a minimum tax provision in the House bill. Both committee actions will increase revenue and are similar to recommendations made previously by the AFL-CIO.

The committee also made changes in House provisions covering foundations. It substituted a one-fifth of 1 percent tax on a foundation's assets for a House-proposed 7.5 percent tax on investment income. It placed a 40-year limit on the life of foundations which pass out money grants rather than operate specific charitable or health programs.

Elmer P. Theiss Dies, Veteran Organizer

Phoenix, Ariz.—Elmer P. Theiss, a veteran organizer with the AFL and later with the AFL-CIO, died here. He was 67.

Savings Bond Interest Boost Passes House

Interest on U.S. Savings Bonds sold to individuals would be increased from 4.25 to 5 percent under a bill passed by the House. The legislation, urged by labor, now goes to the Senate.

Under the bill, the Treasury Dept. would be authorized to pay 5 percent interest on bonds issued on or after June 1, and for interest periods after that date on bonds issued before then.

Currently, individuals hold some $52 billion in savings bonds but their sales have been dropping due to their low rate of return in comparison to other investments.

In calling for adoption of the legislation, the recent AFL-CIO convention pledged continued support for the bonds program under payroll deductions "if we can assure workers that their patriotic purchase of these bonds will assure them a fair return on their investment."

GE Strike Fund Launched, Rallies Set for Major Cities

STUDENT PICKETS from Skidmore College join members of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers Local 301 in the strike against General Electric Co. in Schenectady, N.Y. The walkout of almost 150,000 workers is entering its second week.

'Fight for Survival' Mobilizes Labor

By Eugene A. Kelly

The AFL-CIO called on every union member in America to contribute $1 toward the support of General Electric Co. strikers and started a nationwide fund-raising drive with a donation of $50,000.

Federation Pres. George Meany also announced that the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee has set the week of Nov. 17 for strike-support rallies in more than 20 cities with large GE workforces.

Nearly 150,000 members of 13 unions have been off their jobs since Oct. 26, when GE management refused to change the one flat take-it-or-leave-it offer it had made two weeks earlier. Another 80,000 members of the same unions have authorized a strike at Westinghouse Corp. plants. Their contract expires at midnight Nov. 9.

In setting the $1-a-member goal, Meany said that "if it takes more, we'll raise it. This is a struggle against a company which, as the 2nd U.S. Court of Appeals declared last week, is determined to destroy not only the unions but the whole process of collective bargaining."

It is, he added, "not just a fight for justice by GE workers; it is a fight for survival by the American trade union movement—and the trade union movement intends to survive."

At least one member of the AFL-CIO Executive Council will address each of the rallies set for the week of Nov. 17. (Schedule, Page 3.)

Meany said the rallies will serve three major purposes:

"They will stimulate our campaign to raise $1 from every AFL-CIO union member as an initial strike fund.

Tax Reform Bill Goes to Senate Floor

By David L. Perlman

The Senate Finance Committee gave its final approval to a major overhaul of the federal tax structure but most of the battles it fought behind closed doors will be restaged next month when the legislation comes before the Senate.

The committee bill, however, will be the starting point for the Senate debate. It partly closes some of the loopholes in the present law and lowers — over a three-year period—the tax rate for all income brackets.

Unlike the House, which takes up tax legislation under a no-amendment rule, the Senate has no restrictions on amendments to the committee bill. Thus there will be proposals offered to both tighten and weaken tax reform provisions and to reshape the nature and distribution of tax reductions.

Meany Backs President on Peace Efforts

Pres. Nixon's account of what he has done and is doing to achieve peace in Viet Nam "demonstrates that he deserves the backing of the AFL-CIO and the American public," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

Meany commented after Nixon delivered a national television address explaining his Viet Nam policy and appealing "to the great silent majority" for support.

Nixon told the nation that he has a timetable for withdrawal of American combat forces from Viet Nam but that it must be kept secret and flexible.

The pace of withdrawal, he said, depends on the level of enemy activity, the increasing ability of

To End Poverty Among Aged:

50% Boost Pressed For Social Security

By Duane Emme

Organized labor called on Congress to enact legislation designed to wipe out poverty among the elderly and make the social security system "worthy of a dynamic, confident America."

Meeting that description, the AFL-CIO said, is a bill introduced by Rep. Jacob H. Gilbert (D-N.Y.) providing a 50 percent increase in total social security benefits over the next two years.

Testimony before the House Ways & Means Committee by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller also emphasized the need for improvements in the nation's public welfare program to remove injustices and inequities.

In other areas, Biemiller urged the expansion of Medicare and Medicaid and spelled out labor's views on ways of eliminating poverty. He was accompanied by AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman.

Biemiller complimented the Administration for focusing attention on social security and welfare needs, but he charged that its recommendations in these areas are either "inadequate, inappropriate," or both.

The Administration's proposed 10 percent increase in social security benefits as of next March is "totally inadequate," he declared, because it would not even cover the rise in living costs since February 1968.

"In other words," he added, "the Administration proposal would retrogress from the already inadequate level of social security protection afforded by the 1967 amendments."

Biemiller noted approvingly that the Administration has recommended an increase in the social security earnings base, widow's benefits and a new method of evaluating earnings that would help men who retire at 62 on reduced benefits.

He pointed out, however, that the Administration made no suggestions for dealing with "some of

Tariff Panel Approves First Worker Benefits

The U.S. Tariff Commission has granted, for the first time, a union's request for government adjustment benefits for workers who lost their jobs because of rising imports resulting from trade agreement tariff cuts.

Benefits were authorized under the 1962 Trade Agreement Act, but up to now the Tariff Commission had turned down all requests for relief under what the AFL-CIO had criticized as an overly rigid interpretation of the law.

The breakthrough came on petitions for adjustment aid filed by the Steelworkers on behalf of some 600 members at three plants who lost their jobs because of cutbacks or plant closings.

They were employed at transmission tower plants of U.S. Steel's American Bridge Division at Pittsburgh and Los Angeles, and at the Armco Steel Corp. weld mill at Ambridge, Pa.

In all cases, the Tariff Commission found that the major cause of unemployment was increased imports resulting from trade-agree-

Haynsworth Repudiated By Republican Senators

Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., repeatedly tripped himself up with contradictory testimony on conflict of interest issues before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sen. Robert F. Griffin (R-Mich.) told his colleagues.

Griffin, the Senate's assistant Republican leader, made public his personal report on the nomination — an 18-page document spelling out why he had switched from a supporter to an opponent of the Haynsworth nomination.

Repeatedly, Griffin charged, Haynsworth "indicated an unfortunate lack of judgment" and an insensitivity "to the high ethical standards expected of those who are to sit on the Supreme Court."

A crushing new blow to Haynsworth's already slim chances of confirmation came from Sen. Jack Miller of Iowa, a conservative Republican.

"I cannot vote for his confirmation," Miller told the Senate. He said he had reached his verdict because of Haynsworth's "carelessness" about judicial ethics.

Earlier, a New York Times survey had found a new switch of "at least three" Republican senators to the anti-Haynsworth camp.

The newspaper said its tally—taken before Miller's announcement—showed a probable 53 senators against the nomination, only 38 for confirmation, with nine still carried as undecided.

Meany Praises Speech:

President Endorsed On Viet Nam Policy

South Viet Nam to take over its own defense, and possible progress in Paris peace talks.

Nixon repeatedly ruled out an "immediate" withdrawal or an announced time for it, as some critics have demanded. Such an action, he stressed, would lead to "a disaster of immense magnitude."

The President said the Communists alone are responsible for a deadlock in peace negotiations. As evidence, he revealed some previously secret but unsuccessful efforts he has taken to obtain peace, including an appeal to Ho Chi Minh, the late president of North Viet Nam.

Recalling his campaign pledge to end the war without losing the peace, Nixon said, "The more support I can have from the American people, the sooner that pledge can be redeemed."

Meany described Nixon's address as a "careful and logical" review of the facts and a determination "that America has but two choices—to cut-and-run or keep its word."

"He chose to honor America's commitments and seeks an honorable, negotiated peace," Meany said, adding:

"Our pledge as a nation to aid the South Vietnamese defend their freedom against aggression and our obligation to our American fighting men who are there make his decision unchallengeable."

The President's "candid account of negotiations" for peace, Meany pointed out, "makes it abundantly clear that responsibility for continuation of the war rests solely on those who started the war—the North Vietnamese.

"It must be apparent to the enemy and to the President's critics at home that Hanoi and Hanoi alone can now signal continued hostility or peace."

In reference to Nixon's plea for support from the American people, Meany recalled that a resolution passed by the AFL-CIO convention "noted with approval the efforts made by Pres. Nixon to bring the war to an end through negotiating an honorable peace."

Division and calls for unilateral withdrawal of American forces, the resolution warned, will "only encourage the North Viet Nam regime to continue the war and count on its sooner or later forcing our country to accede to its demand for American capitulation."

A few days before the President's televised message, the Citizens Committee for Peace with Freedom issued a report based on a fact-finding mission to Viet Nam which buttressed Nixon's policy.

The committee was founded in 1967 by the late Pres. Eisenhower, former Pres. Truman, former Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) and 127 other national leaders. Meany serves as a committee co-chairman.

A nine-member commission sent to Viet Nam by the committee concluded that a policy of U.S. troop withdrawal can succeed provided that it "take place primarily on the basis of demonstrated improvement in South Vietnamese capabilities."

The commission emphasized "that no timetable for withdrawals be proclaimed and that any schedule developed for planning purposes be flexible."

The commission found that the U.S. policy of "Vietnamization" of the war is making headway but is still "fragile." It urged Nixon to form a commission to study the policy to see if it can be speeded up and strengthened.

The findings were included in a comprehensive policy statement in which the committee stated that "the choice in Viet Nam is between the road to defeat and the road to peace and freedom."

The road to defeat, the committee warned, will be marked by "precipitous or premature withdrawal of American forces" before the South Vietnamese are ready to take over the job of protecting themselves.

The consequences of defeat, the committee added, would be the complete subjugation of South Viet Nam to "Communist invaders from the north" and the killing of thousands of South Vietnamese who fought for freedom.

The committee said, "We do not seek a military victory in Viet Nam; we seek to deny military victory to the enemy. We do not seek to win the war; we seek to win the peace."

Rail Shopcraft Unions Criticize Emergency Board's Pay Proposal

Four railroad shopcraft unions have voiced dissatisfaction with a presidential emergency board's recommendations in their wage dispute with the nation's railroads.

The unions pointed out, however, that the panel's report can form the basis for further negotiations and an equitable settlement to head off a possible strike.

The board recommended that the unions—Machinists, Sheet Metal Workers, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and Boilermakers—accept a "pattern" wage increase of 5 percent that other rail unions have agreed to.

It also recommended a separate increase of at least 20 cents an hour for "more skilled and responsible" workmen, amounting to between 15 and 25 percent of the 48,000 employes represented by the unions.

The board further proposed that the two sides negotiate rules changes to make possible a "special additional wage increase" through gains in efficiency and productivity.

IAM Vice Pres. William Winpisinger, spokesman for the four unions, pointed out that the "pattern" increase—2 percent retroactive to Jan. 1, 1969, and 3 percent retroactive to July 1, 1969, amounted to a 3.5 percent wage increase over a 12-month period.

Noting that the cost of living is going up at an annual rate of 6 percent, Winpisinger said, "Obviously, we aren't going to sit still for that."

In addition to seeking a 10 percent general wage increase, effective Jan. 1, 1969, the unions have asked for a cost-of-living escalator clause. The board dismissed this request without comment.

The unions are seeking additional skill adjustments for journeymen and mechanics, including supervisors they represent, of 10 cents an hour effective Apr. 1, 1969, and 10 cents an hour effective Oct. 1, 1969.

The unions also seek interest on deferred payments on increases due, shift differentials and premium pay for Saturday and Sunday work. The carriers offered only the 5 percent pay increase and demanded numerous rules changes.

The board recommended that the carriers accept uniform minimum rates of pay proposed by the unions. Except for its recommendation of further talks on rules changes proposed by management, the board urged withdrawal of all other proposals advanced by both sides.

Dealing with the issue of collective bargaining in the railroad industry, the board expressed concern that there had been "less than 15 hours" of face-to-face negotiations in the current dispute prior to government intervention.

The panel called for "re-examination" of a bargaining structure that imposes an inflexible "wage pattern" on all railroad unions. It claimed it was "trapped" by the pattern.

It was Winpisinger, in arguments before the board, who pointed to the small amount of actual bargaining, charging that the carriers had obstinately refused to bargain.

He said the unions' wage requests were justified because their members are inadequately compensated for their ever-increasing skills. "The imposition of a pattern doesn't meet the need in this case," he said.

The emergency board was appointed by Pres. Nixon after the unions set an Oct. 4 strike deadline on six railroads—Santa Fe, Great Northern, Erie-Lackawanna, Illinois Central, Southern, and Chesapeake & Ohio-Baltimore & Ohio—and the carriers threatened to lock out workers on other major railroads.

The board was headed by Ralph T. Seward, a Washington arbitrator. Other members were Robert Livernash of Harvard University and Robert Howlett, head of the Michigan State Mediation Service.

Under the terms of the Railway Labor Act, which requires a 30-day period of status quo following an emergency board's report, the unions will be free to strike on or after Dec. 3 if a settlement is not reached by then.

Medical Care Funds Urged For Migrants

The AFL-CIO has asked Congress to authorize more money for health care services for the nation's migratory farm workers and their families.

Legislation being considered by a Senate subcommittee on health would continue the program an additional five years—to 1975—and more than double the dollar ceiling on federal funds.

The expansion is needed, the federation said in a statement to the subcommittee, because only one-third of the nation's migratory workers now live or work in areas where health facilities are available.

Nearly 700,000 other men, women and children who follow the crops "live and work outside the areas served by existing migrant health projects," the AFL-CIO statement noted.

While "much progress has been made" since the passage of the Migrant Health Act in 1962, the pace is too slow and the range of health services inadequate, the federation said.

Under the proposed legislation—co-sponsored by all 12 Democrats and two of the seven Republicans on the full Senate Labor Committee—the amount authorized for migratory health services would rise steadily from $15 million this year to $40 million by the 1975 fiscal year.

Textile Workers Win Stevens Vote, Company Hit with 7th NLRB Ruling

Winston-Salem, N. C.—Employes of J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., at the Black Hawk warehouse here picked the Textile Workers Union of America as bargaining agent, the National Labor Relations Board announced after a count of challenged ballots. The official count in the election, held two years ago, was 36-27 for TWUA.

The results, TWUA Pres. William Pollock said, prove that contrary to company claims the union "can win elections among Stevens workers once they are allowed to vote in an atmosphere free of intimidation and coercion."

Stevens has been found guilty of interference with the rights of its employes seven times in recent years. The seventh case was recorded this week in a trial examiner's decision that Stevens fired two union supporters to destroy the union in one of its textile plants.

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. began organizing the Black Hawk warehouse in 1967. After it petitioned for an election, management changed its cotton flow as an excuse to lay off a warehouse section where union sentiment was most strong, a trial examiner ruled last December.

The NLRB upheld Examiner Owsley Vose's ruling that 14 ballots of illegally fired employes must be counted. Stevens appealed and finally lost its case.

The other Stevens ruling was made by Examiner Laurence A. Knapp after hearings in Roanoke Rapids, N. C. Knapp found that Stevens management at plants in that city found excuses to fire two employes on trumped-up charges.

He ordered their reinstatement to their lost jobs with full seniority. Knapp also recommended that Stevens be ordered to make up the pay they lost, plus 6 percent interest.

Besides these steps, the examiner asked that the NLRB apply the same extraordinary remedies it has applied in six other cases to help make up for management's lawbreaking.

These would require Stevens to inform all employes of their rights under the law, assure them that the company will "cease and desist" from its misconduct, post a notice of its willingness to comply with the board order and mail a copy to the homes of all employes, give the union access to plant bulletin boards for one year and a name-and-address list of all Roanoke Rapids plant employes, and read the board's order to meetings of employes called during working time in each department and on all shifts.

The examiner recalled that Stevens' "record of persistent, grave and frequently blatant" violations of the act from 1963 to 1969 has been established in a series of decisions—six by the NLRB, five by appeals courts which upheld the board.

Stevens is a major government contractor. TWUA and the AFL-CIO have urged the Administration to issue an executive order forbidding any government agency to contract with convicted law violators like Stevens.

Labor Builds Support for GE Strikers

Fund Drive Opens, Big City Rallies Set

"They will help educate the general public about the issues in this strike and the illegal behavior of the General Electric management.

"They will be the start of continuing, community-wide campaigns in each location to back the GE strikers in every way until they have won."

The GE Strike Relief Fund is being established in the office of AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland.

As pickets marched at GE plants in 33 states there were these other developments:

- The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service called GE and the unions to a meeting Nov. 7 in the Belmont-Plaza Hotel in New York City—the first meeting with mediators since the strike began.
- The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers asked the National Labor Relations Board's regional director in New York to speed up a hearing on IUE's charges that GE failed to bargain in good faith and to seek a temporary Taft-Hartley injunction restraining GE from continuing the "unlawful conduct" that caused the strike.
- AFL-CIO Community Services offered its aid to all the striking unions in setting up strike-relief committees and named Ray Andrus of its staff as coordinator.

Westinghouse resumed bargaining with two of the coordinated unions a few days before the Nov. 9 strike deadline. All the unions have rejected its one previous offer.

Meany's announcement of a national strike support fund drive followed a meeting with a special committee of the Executive Council, named last week to mobilize union financial resources for the duration of the strike.

The committee consists of Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers, Pres. Thomas W. Gleason of the Longshoremen and Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers—all AFL-CIO vice presidents.

Meany said he instructed Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher to place the federation's nationwide network of regional offices at the disposal of the GE strikers.

Additional steps to carry on the fight were taken at a meeting of the Coordinated Bargaining Committee, which consists of the presidents of the 10 federation unions that represent GE workers, with Meany as chairman.

Meany said the coordinated committee will meet again Nov. 14 to review developments. Under consideration will be other support moves and proposals for a nationwide consumer boycott of GE products.

The striking AFL-CIO unions are the Machinists, Steelworkers, Technical Engineers, Carpenters, Plumbers, Allied Industrial Workers, Sheet Metal Workers, Flint Glass Workers, the IBEW and the IUE. Also coordinating strike activities are the unaffiliated Teamsters, Auto Workers and United Electrical Workers.

Solidarity was reported strong and spirits high on the picket lines. IUE Local 704, Bucyrus, O., reported it has signed up six new members since the strike started.

Additional unions joined the strike when their GE contracts expired. They include IBEW 1805, Baltimore, Md., and several IAM locals in Utica, N.Y.

COORDINATED BARGAINING COMMITTEE of 10 AFL-CIO unions with 147,000 members on strike against General Electric Co. meets in AFL-CIO headquarters with Federation Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland. The committee set the week of Nov. 17 for strike-support meetings in 23 major cities.

Rail Firemen Win Decision On Apprentices

The Supreme Court has let stand a decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia requiring railroads to bargain on a union-proposed three-year program of apprenticeship for engineers.

In 1965, the Firemen & Enginemen, now part of the United Transportation Union, served notices on the railroads under the Railway Labor Act proposing the training program for engineers, who traditionally have come from the ranks of firemen.

The unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers objected to the proposal, claiming its jurisdiction was being invaded. After the National Mediation Board rejected an Engineers' application that the board determine jurisdiction in the case, the union went to court. The Louisville & Nashville Railroad, which refused to negotiate with the Firemen, also entered the litigation.

The U.S. District Court in Washington agreed with the litigants that the mediation board should decide jurisdiction, but the Appeals Court reversed that decision, pointing out that the board lacked jurisdiction under the law.

Schedule of Strike Rallies

AFL-CIO rallies in support of the strike against General Electric will be held in 23 major cities from coast to coast.

All rallies will take place within a four-day period, Nov. 17-20, and all will be in the evening. Each will bring together the top leadership of the trade union movement in the area, and each will be addressed by a member of the AFL-CIO Executive Council and a representative of the strikers.

Following is the day-by-day schedule:

Nov. 17: Atlanta, Electric Plaza Auditorium; Los Angeles, Roosevelt Hall; San Francisco, Del Webb Town House; Oakland, Labor Temple.

Nov. 18: Chicago, Musicians Hall; Philadelphia, Sheraton Hotel; St. Louis, Carpenters Hall No. 1.

Nov. 19: Birmingham, USWA Local 1013 Hall, Fairfield; Boston, Hotel Bradford; Cleveland, Manger Hotel; Detroit, Retail Clerks Local 876 Hall; Memphis, Rubber Workers Hall; Milwaukee, Local 19806 Hall; Minneapolis-St. Paul, Palm Ballroom; Seattle, Labor Temple.

Nov. 20: Baltimore, Clerks Hall; Houston, AFL-CIO Building; New Orleans, Seafarers Hall; New York, Roosevelt Auditorium; Pittsburgh, William Penn Hotel; Portland, Ore., Portland Labor Center.

The dates will be the 18th in Louisville and the 19th in Kansas City but the halls have not yet been set.

Price-Fixing Record Destroys GE's Pose as 'Inflation-Fighter'

General Electric is trying on the mantle of inflation-fighter as it seeks to bludgeon 13 unions into submission to its take-it-or-leave-it parody of collective bargaining.

But the coat doesn't fit.

GE's talk of 'inflationary" union proposals falls flat to those who remember the company's dominant role in the electrical equipment industry's multi-billion dollar antitrust conspiracy.

So gross was the price-gouging and rigging of bids to keep prices artificially high that, in 1961, a federal judge sentenced a group of high-ranking corporation executives to jail as well as levying heavy fines against the companies.

And in a caustic comment regarding the responsibility of the top officers of GE, who claimed that they had seen no evil, the judge said "one would be most naive indeed to believe that these violations of the law, so long persisted in, affecting so large a segment of the industry and finally, involving so many millions upon millions of dollars, were facts unknown to those responsible for the conduct of the corporation."

As picket lines went up at GE plants, the company's chief executive officer, Fred J. Borch, told a stockholders' meeting in Minneapolis that the company was manning the barricades against labor efforts to give "the economy another upspin, to super-inflation."

The stockholders applauded—as they had in the first stockholders' meeting after the antitrust conspiracy trial when they were called on to give GE's management "a standing ovation of confidence for a job well done."

They may have violated the letter of the law, a spokesman for a stockholders' group said, "but they did not violate the main spirit of free enterprise—a fair return on a dollar invested."

In violating the "letter of the law, according to evidence presented by the Justice Dept., executives of GE and its supposed competitors met at airport motels, at exclusive island resorts, and at a Milwaukee bar known as "Dirty Helen's."

There they set prices and carved up the market. There, at a corporate equivalent of a kangaroo court trial, a company that had made a sale below the agreed-on price was warned to mend its ways.

In the code used by the conspirators to camouflage their actions, the Justice Dept. revealed GE was referred to as Number 1.

That's what its rank in the industry was and is. And that's how it rated in the price-raising conspiracy.

From a Justice Dept. bill of particulars came an intriguing account of GE's leadership in forcing up prices.

A high-ranking GE official joined other conspirators at a remote island camp near North Bay, Ontario. Representatives of the other companies were in a single cabin, hassling over prices and markets. The GE official stayed in splendid isolation at a nearby cabin—keeping in touch through a go-between.

At a key point in the discussion, the GE executive sent over a "suggestion" that prices be raised 10 percent.

Dutifully, the action was taken. GE was still Number 1.

Bakery Workers Win Pact in Nabisco Strike

A new offer by the National Biscuit Co. was accepted by 9,000 members of the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers to end their strike at 13 plants in 10 states.

The strikers voted by a 6-1 margin to accept a two-year agreement valued by the union at 61 cents an hour in improved benefits. The strike that started Sept. 7 ended Nov. 3 when the first shift of workers resumed production at plants of the world's largest biscuit baker.

ABC blamed the strike on the company's flat one-offer take-it-or-leave-it system of bargaining —similar to that employed by the General Electric Co.

Support of three Italian unions and the International Union of Food & Allied Workers' Associations was credited with helping end the strike. Workers in Milan and Genoa plants of Nabisco affiliates staged a one-hour demonstration walkout last month and other IUF unions pledged their backing also if Nabisco refused to settle.

The new contract provides general wage increases of 27 cents an hour this year, another 20 cents next year.

An increase of 6 cents an hour to the union-industry welfare fund will bring total company contributions to $35.46 a month per employe. This will pay full hospital room and board charges for 70 days, instead of the former payment of $30 a day.

The weekly sick pay maximum was raised from $50 a week to $60. Miscellaneous hospital costs will be paid in full. Maternity benefits are up from a maximum of $120 to $200, and the X-ray and laboratory maximum of $50 will be renewed every 26 weeks, instead of once a year as before.

The strikers won an additional paid holiday for a total of 10; an increase of 12.5 cents an hour in night premium pay, and other benefits.

At three plants, the rate structure was revised upward in a long step toward eliminating regional wage differences, ABC said. Numerous classification adjustments also were won.

Nabisco increased its premium payment into the pension fund by 3.5 cents an hour per employe. This will permit workers to retire with full benefits before age 65 under the "Golden 90" formula adding years of service to age to produce the figure 90.

Ratification was approved at all the struck plants except one in Portland, Ore., where the vote was 151 in favor, 168 opposed.

Booklet Evaluates Training Films

New York—A 48-page booklet describing and evaluating films dealing with job training for minority groups and ghetto problems has been published by the American Foundation on Automation & Employment.

The guide is based on films produced by companies, trade associations, unions, government agencies and nonprofit organizations that were shown in a recent Job Film Fair sponsored here by the Foundation.

The booklet, Films on Jobs, Training and the Ghetto, is available for $4.50 plus 50 cents postage and handling charge from the American Foundation on Automation & Employment, 280 Park Ave., New York, N.Y., 10017.

ESTABLISHED LIBERAL CONCEPTS are not obsolete and the labor movement will continue to abide by them "without embarrassment or apology," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland tells the Jewish Labor Committee in New York. Other labor officials speaking at the biennial convention included Federation Vice Pres. Frederick O'Neal.

Showdown Next Month:

Major Battle Slated On Tax Bill in Senate

meal voting on the tax reform portion of the legislation, the Senate committee reached quick agreement on the tax relief sections.

It followed the House-passed bill closely on tax relief, the chief departure being a postponement of about $1 billion in tax cuts from 1971 to 1972.

The effect of this would be to bring in more tax revenue during the first two years of the law through loophole-closing and repeal of the investment tax credit than would be lost through lower tax rates.

This stretchout particularly pleased the Administration and Treasury Sec. David M. Kennedy praised the overall effect of the bill as a "major contribution to the cause of tax reform."

The Senate committee, however, snubbed the Administration on its proposal to reduce the corporation income tax below the House bill and to make up for the revenue loss by giving a smaller tax break to individuals in the lower and middle income brackets.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany had denounced the Treasury proposal as "a shocking display of concern for America's wealthy and powerful at the expense of all the rest."

The bill that emerged from committee, while taking some important steps towards equalizing the tax burden, was a pale shadow of the tax justice program the AFL-CIO had urged in House and Senate testimony.

The federation's program, keyed to equal tax treatment of all income and a tax structure based on ability to pay, would have yielded some $16 billion a year in additional revenue — enough to finance significant tax reforms and provide the money needed to fully fund needed government programs.

Special interest lobbyists, out to preserve or widen existing loopholes, found the Senate Finance Committee receptive to weakening the House bill—at least until labor and other tax reform supporters raised a public outcry.

While a few reform provisions in the House bill were strengthened or improved, the overall impact of the Senate changes was to weaken an already anemic measure.

Demands for more meaningful reform expected to be made in the Senate floor debate include proposals to:

- Raise the tax on capital gains income and lengthen the period that investments must be held before their profits can be considered capital gains.
- A deeper cut in the oil and gas depletion allowance than either the House reduction from 27.5 to 20 percent or the Senate committee's 23 percent "compromise."
- Complete repeal of the 7 percent investment tax credit without the special exemptions.
- Restoration of the House-passed tax on banks to eliminate the present padding of tax-exempt bad debt reserves.
- Tighter closing of the "hobby farming" loophole.
- Inclusion of income from tax-exempt bonds in the Senate committee's minimum income tax provision, with a higher minimum than the 5 percent tax proposed by the committee.
- Revision of the tax relief provisions to give a greater share of benefits to moderate-income families and less of a reduction to the wealthy.

A battle can also be expected on the Senate floor over a proposal by Sen. Paul J. Fannin (R-Ariz.) to deny unions their tax-exempt status if they engage in political action. The Fannin proposal was defeated on an 8-8 tie vote in the Senate Finance Committee.

New Mexico Rejects 'R-T-W' Plank

Albuquerque — The New Mexico Constitutional Convention voted 49-18 to reject a "right-to-work" provision in a proposed new state constitution. Voters will go to the polls in December to accept or reject the final draft of the constitution.

The margin of defeat was the largest ever recorded on the anti-union measure in this state. Foes of union shop agreements have tried repeatedly to get the measure through the legislature, New Mexico AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Neal Gonzalez reported. He said 17 of the 18 convention delegates from the Albuquerque area voted against the compulsory open shop proposal.

Jewish Labor Group Observes 35th Year

New York—Calls for a further strengthening of the alliance between the Jewish community, labor and minority groups featured the biennial convention of the Jewish Labor Committee here.

The convention, marking the 35th anniversary of JLC, was attended by 500 delegates representing 500,000 members of affiliated organizations across the nation.

In a message to the delegates, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany praised the long relationship between American trade unions and JLC and predicted that the ties would grow stronger in the years ahead.

The convention's two principal speakers were AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and Family Court Judge Jacob T. Zukerman of New York, who is first vice president of JLC.

Fight Against Bigotry

Kirkland noted that the problems facing workers, the nation and the world are much the same in nature as they were when JLC came into being.

"Bigotry and prejudice of every sort still persist," he said. "Discrimination still denies full citizenship and equal opportunity to many. Totalitarianism still controls the lives of millions around the globe."

But, he pointed out, at least in part because of the efforts of the JLC and other liberal organizations, "those poisonous anti-human forces have not triumphed. We have made progress, and as long as those forces exist, we must and will continue to resist them." (Excerpts, Page 6.)

Zukerman urged delegates not to be misled by the views of extremist blacks. "They do not speak for all Negroes any more than the Jewish Defense League speaks for all Jews," he declared.

For Social Change

"We are against violence but we also are for positive social change," Zukerman said. "Responsible Negro and Jewish leadership must not allow the alliance between Jews and Negroes to crack."

Sessions of the convention were devoted to discussion of programs to rebuild the nation's cities, the "generation gap," Soviet anti-semitism, racial and religious discrimination and the effect of inflation on workers.

The convention adopted resolutions of support for the California grape boycott and the strike at General Electric.

Charles S. Zimmerman, Ladies' Garment Workers vice president, was elected JLC's new president. The office had been vacant since the death of Adolph Held.

Other officers elected included Albert Shanker, president of Teachers Local 2, secretary; Jerry Wurf, president of the State, County & Municipal Employes, as a vice president; Jacob Clayman, administrative director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., a member of the executive board; and Jacob Sheinkman, Clothing Workers vice president, chairman of JLC's administrative committee.

Oil Union Wins Pact on Mobil Tanker Fleet

New York—Nine ships in Mobil Oil Co.'s tanker fleet resumed sailing when members of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers ratified a new three-year contract meeting OCAW requirements on union security.

Nearly 300 workers ended a two-month strike after approving the settlement. It provides wage increases of 6 percent across the board in each contract year, increases in coverage and differentials for specified job assignments, longer vacations, improved overtime pay, and higher off-ship expense allowances.

Union security provisions include the right of union members to respect picket lines, and work rules protecting the size of ships' crews.

Mobil granted a modified union shop—a right provided in few contracts with major oil companies, the union said. OCAW Vice Pres. A. S. Sabatine headed the union negotiators.

The company's tankers had been tied up at ports on the East and Gulf coasts. Strike settlement terms were ratified Nov. 2 after a final negotiating session of more than 50 hours.

The strike was the fourth major dispute of the year for OCAW. Last month AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called on all unions and their members to give "all possible financial assistance" to a special fund started by the Executive Council with a $10,000 contribution.

Three Building Crafts Reach Pact On Factory-Built Modular Homes

Three of the nation's largest craft unions have signed a contract that will put a union label on prefabricated homes built in the factory in a module or package and erected on homesites anywhere in the country.

The contract with Prestige Structures, Inc., of Charlotte, Mich., was signed by Presidents M. A. Hutcheson of the Carpenters, Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters and Charles H. Pillard of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Executive Vice Pres. Alan Ginsburg of VTR, Inc., of New York City, signed for the company, a VTR subsidiary.

Prestige Structures plans to produce 70 modular homes a week at its Michigan plant 60 miles west of Detroit. Factory production of the homes will be jointly industrialized by the three craft unions.

Ginsburg said production of 20 different home styles on a mass basis is planned. He called the new contract a "wholly new concept in union agreements . . . to meet today's urgent demand for homes with speed both on the production line and at the homesite."

The signers expressed the hope that the agreement will provide a model for future contracts in the homebuilding industry, especially in the production of modular housing. The terms will apply to any additional plants opened by Prestige Structures in the U.S. and Canada, except that wages and fringe benefits will be negotiated at the local level.

The three union presidents, who are members of the President's Construction Industry Collective Bargaining Commission, appeared with Housing & Urban Development Sec. George Romney, Assistant Labor Sec. William Usery Jr., and Ginsburg at a press conference announcing the agreement.

Hutcheson called the agreement "another step in the right direction." Pillard said it "shows we are concerned" about the home shortage. Schoemann said his union made a "thorough study" of the proposal and agreed to take part though skilled craftsmen will perform a "minor portion" of the onsite work.

Ginsburg told newsmen his Michigan factory has produced about 125 housing units, mainly for public authorities in Detroit, Lansing, Cleveland, Columbus, O., and East St. Louis, Ill.

Fully equipped units of three bedrooms and a bath can be built for "well under $10,000" and erected on a homeowner's lot for approximately $15,000. The house offers 980 square feet of living space, he said.

The firm pays top wages of $4.30 an hour to factory labor hired locally under a contract with HUD. It trains minority-group workers under government programs to be supervised on the job by skilled members of the three crafts. He said Prestige Structures is "sold out" at Charlotte for all of 1970 but plans to open six more factories soon—one in Toronto, Ont. —under agreements like the one in Michigan.

The agreement sets up machinery for settling disputes at construction sites through this language:

"There shall be no strike or lockout pending any dispute being investigated and all peaceful means taken to bring about a peaceful settlement."

Where company and local union representatives are unable to reach agreement, the dispute "shall be referred to the applicable international union president for settlement. The president . . . will assign a representative to meet . . . and resolve the dispute."

The pact signers agreed to develop a "Tri-Trades Union Label" to be attached to every unit shipped from the factory.

Ginsburg praised the unions for taking a "long look toward the future of the housing industry." He said the contract will "permit the same pay scales to all trades," cover women as well as men workers and "make possible job interchangeability in the factory."

Loose Ethics, Poor Judgment Cited:

Republican Senators Balk At Haynsworth Nomination

The shift away from Haynsworth took place, it reported, despite "intense" political and financial pressure on Republican senators.

As an example, it cited the case of Sen. Richard S. Schweiker (R-Pa.) who "was telephoned by a Cabinet officer and by three of his major campaign contributors back in Pennsylvania, all of them under prodding from the Administration."

The senator's staff confirmed the account to the AFL-CIO News.

The Administration hasn't given up on the nomination by any means—and the President is still on record that he won't withdraw it to stave off defeat. But for the first time, a White House aide told newsmen publicly that he "wasn't sure" Haynsworth could be confirmed.

A Senate leader of the Haynsworth forces — Sen. Marlow W. Cook (R-Ky.)—conceded that "the nomination is in difficulty." He said Haynsworth's chances for confirmation have diminished "every time someone announced his opposition."

Senator Majority Leader Mike Mansfield indicated that the nomination will be brought to the Senate floor by mid-November.

Outside Preparation

The Judiciary Committee's majority report supporting Haynsworth has been drafted by the Justice Dept. for circulation to committee members, according to the Associated Press.

Griffin, however, made public his own "individual views" without waiting on the formal committee report. Ironically, the Michigan senator had been urged by the Administration to claim a vacancy on the Judiciary Committee after he had indicated that he supported Haynsworth's confirmation.

But the hearings, Griffin said, caused him to conclude that Haynsworth should be rejected "in the interest of preserving public confidence in our system of justice."

Griffin found that Haynsworth's account of his role in the Carolina Vend-A-Matic Co. didn't square with the facts.

He noted that last June, testifying on proposed legislation affecting the judiciary, Haynsworth said of his own role: "Of course, when I went on the bench I resigned from all such business associations I had, directorships and things of that sort. . . ."

When confronted with that statement after his nomination, Haynsworth admitted that it wasn't so and that he had remained a director of Vend-A-Matic for six years after becoming a federal judge—including the period in which he sat on the Deering Milliken textile case, involving the union-busting policies of a major customer of his vending firm.

Another Contradiction

Griffin noted that Haynsworth told the Judiciary Committee that his "recollection" is that he resigned as vice president of Vend-A-Matic "when I went on the court in 1957" although he conceded that the corporation minutes show him reelected each year until 1964.

Griffin said the minutes showed that election of officers was the principal business at each of the annual meetings, that Haynsworth attended each meeting at which he was re-elected, and that two of the annual meeting minutes were prepared by his wife, who in 1962 and 1963 was the paid secretary of the corporation.

As vice president, Haynsworth told the Judiciary Committee, "I did not have any active duty in that office." And in 1963, when a question was raised about his participation in the Deering-Milliken cases, he assured the chief judge of his appellate court that he "has had no active participation in the affairs of Carolina Vend-A-Matic, has never sought business for it or discussed procurement of locations for it with the officials or employes of any other company."

From the board minutes of the corporation, Griffin quoted the contradictory statement: "It was pointed out that the main sales and promotion work of Carolina Vend-A-Matic had been done by its directors who are also the officers of the corporation, and that any new locations were the result of many conversations, trips and various forms of entertainment of potential customers."

Griffin noted that the minutes of board meetings do not indicate that Haynsworth "was ever excused or relieved of any corporate responsibilities because of his position as a judge."

In other areas, Griffin told the Senate, the record shows that Haynsworth's role, despite his disavowal, was "active, important and perhaps vital to the spectacular success of the company—a company in which his investment of approximately $2,400 in 1950 brought him roughly $450,000 in 1964."

The Griffin report finds "disturbing" not only Haynsworth's purchase of 1,000 shares of Brunswick Corp. stock before a case involving the company which he heard as a judge was finally decided, but the nominee's failure to disclose the purchase to his colleagues on the court or to the parties in the case so as to give them a chance to object to his continued participation.

And, in violation of judicial canons, Griffin notes, Haynsworth repeatedly judged cases involving clients of his former law firm. The record shows, he pointed out, that Haynsworth decided 10 of 12 cases in favor of the clients of his former partners.

Still another question as to Haynsworth's ethical standards was raised as a result of a tax deduction episode uncovered by Columnists Tom Braden and Frank Mankiewicz.

They reported that both Haynsworth and a friend of his, the late Charles Daniel, had claimed substantial tax deductions by selling the same house to Furman University. Daniel served briefly as a U.S. senator from South Carolina, headed a construction firm which battled unions throughout the South and was a director of the J. P. Stevens Co.

According to the newspaper columnists, he donated his home to Furman University and claimed a $115,000 tax deduction on the gift.

Eleven days after the deed of gift was recorded, Haynsworth bought the home from the university, paying for part of it by contributing his own $50,000 house.

Four years later, the columnists reported, he donated the house back to the university under an arrangement that gave him continued occupancy for the lifetime of himself and his wife, and claimed the $115,000 tax deduction over a five-year period.

A White House spokesman said the tax deductions were "perfectly legal" as long as there had not been any prior arrangement between Haynsworth and Daniel. He said Haynsworth had assured him there that the double tax deduction on the same property had not been prearranged.

NEA Bids Nixon Drop Haynsworth

The National Education Association has called on Pres. Nixon to withdraw the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr.

It wired all senators urging them to vote against confirmation if the nomination comes to a vote.

The telegrams sent by the nation's largest organization of teachers and school administrators sharply criticized Haynsworth's civil rights record.

GOP Adds Governors In Virginia, New Jersey

Republicans won the two governorships at stake in the Nov. 4 elections, adding Virginia and New Jersey to the 30 state houses they already controlled.

Both gubernatorial winners were considered moderates in the context of their state's politics and one—Virginia's Gov.-Elect A. Linwood Holton—had the endorsement of the State AFL-CIO. Labor-endorsed Democrats won Virginia's two other statewide contests, for lieutenant governor and attorney general.

Republican Congressman William T. Cahill profited from a divided Democratic Party to become New Jersey's first GOP governor in 16 years. He easily blocked the comeback attempt of Robert B. Meyner, a former governor, and the GOP strengthened its control of the legislature.

The only congressional seat at stake in the election—in New Jersey's 8th District—apparently stayed Democratic, although the vote was so close that a recount is under way. Democrat Robert A. Roe held the lead over Republican Gene Boyle, Jr., for the seat vacated when Charles S. Joelson resigned to accept a state court appointment.

The city elections throughout the nation were a mixed bag, with Democratic and Republican gains roughly balancing out.

The big prize—New York City—went to Mayor John V. Lindsay who put together a coalition that gave him a modest plurality over the Democratic and Republican candidates.

Lindsay, running on Liberal Party and independent tickets, polled 981,810 votes to 821,924 for Democrat Mario A. Procaccino and 544,758 for John J. Marchi, who had edged out Lindsay in the Republican primary earlier this year.

The White House was silent about Lindsay's victory but the President expressed his delight at the gubernatorial gains.

National attention was focused also on Cleveland, where Democrat Carl B. Stokes—the first Negro elected mayor of a large city two years ago—narrowly won his reelection bid.

In Detroit, in a non-partisan election, County Sheriff Roman S. Gribbs edged out a Negro candidate, County Auditor Richard H. Austin in the race to succeed retiring Mayor Jerome P. Cavanagh.

Political observers had their eye on the "backlash" possibility in the Buffalo election, where liberal Democrat Frank A. Sedita was being opposed for re-election as mayor by a conservative Republican "law-and-order" candidate and a Negro running as an independent.

Sedia won an unprecedented third term with ease.

After eight years under a Republican Mayor, Louisville voters elected Democrat Frank W. Burke, a former congressman.

Two large cities where Democratic mayors were retiring reelected Democrats to succeed them —reform Democrat Peter T. Flaherty in Pittsburgh and Bartholomew Guida in New Haven.

A Republican won a four-way contest in Hartford, Conn., and the GOP ousted a three-term Democratic mayor in Youngstown, O. But Democrats pulled upset victories in Syracuse and several other New York State communities and in Waterbury, Conn.

Voters in two states defeated proposals to lower the voting age. In statewide ballots, Ohio rejected a proposal to give 19-year-olds the right to vote and New Jersey refused to lower the voting age to 18.

New York Labor Backs Viet Policy But Scores Nixon on Haynsworth

Buffalo—Delegates to the New York State AFL-CIO convention here overwhelmingly backed Pres. Nixon's policy in Viet Nam but opposed the President on his nomination of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., for the Supreme Court.

Both actions by the 2,040 delegates and alternates were based on resolutions submitted by the executive council of the state labor organization and were in keeping with statements by State Pres. Raymond R. Corbett in his opening address.

The vote on the Viet Nam resolution came after an hour of spirited debate on U.S. involvement there and the President's actions during his first 10 months in office.

"It is our conviction," the resolution concluded, "that Pres. Nixon is pursuing the right policy to bring the war to an honorable end.

"It is therefore vital that in this sensitive and complex situation we not only refrain from anything that would hinder the President in his efforts, but that we all rally behind him and express full confidence and support."

Concerning Judge Haynsworth, the resolution asserted that his business dealings involving litigants before his court revealed "a lack of comprehension of the conduct required of a judge." The resolution said Haynsworth's decisions in civil rights and labor cases showed him to be "hostile" to workers and "insensitive" to the basic rights of citizens.

The delegates called on Haynsworth to withdraw himself from consideration, or, for the President to withdraw the nomination. Failing both, they urged rejection of the nomination on the floor of the Senate.

In a special message, the delegates pledged full support of the 13 unions involved in the GE plant strike that began as the convention opened.

They called for repeal of the state's "Blaine amendment" barring aid to church-related schools after Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller, noting growing financial problems of such schools, told the delegates that "we have got to look down this road and see that everyone has the greatest possible educational opportunities."

A proposal by the State School Board Association—meeting at the same time in Syracuse—to repeal the public school teacher tenure law was promptly condemned by the labor delegates in Buffalo as an attempt to end teacher job security and academic freedom.

Proposed by the building trades, a resolution was passed calling for national political conventions of both major parties in 1970 to set a single national policy for the nation's urban crisis, including fair application of federal job demands for members of minorities in these trades.

Other resolutions urged a $3-an-hour statewide minimum wage, a national prepaid health insurance program under a social security-type system, completion of fair tax reform by Congress, upgrading of state social insurance benefits, and legalized off-track betting.

Advice for GE

PRES. NIXON had some sound advice for General Electric Co. the other day, advice that GE might well take to heart.

The President was talking to the Inter-American Press Association in Washington about the necessity for achieving a "mature partnership" of all the nations of the Americas, a partnership that should be guided by a simple principle:

"Give-and-take is better than take-it-or-leave-it."

We're not sure if this constitutes government interference in labor-management relations, but we would urge GE to heed the President's very sound advice.

Labor's Mission

THERE IS REALLY very little that is essentially new about the problems that surround us. Their nature is much the same as when this venture, this alliance of the liberal Jewish community and the trade union movement began. Bigotry and prejudice of every sort still persist. Discrimination still denies full citizenship and equal opportunity to many. Totalitarianism still controls the lives of millions around the globe.

But, in part at least because of our existence, those poisonous anti-human forces have not triumphed. We have made progress, and as long as those forces exist, we must and will continue to resist them.

As we look forward to the Seventies, we must be conscious of our duties as trade unionists and as free citizens, and we must balance what we have achieved with what remains to be done.

We have helped this nation reach the highest standard of living in history. Yet our cities are scarred and blighted by some of the world's worst slums.

We have made collective bargaining a strong instrument of progress and a generally accepted approach to the resolution of issues. Yet farm workers are still barred from any federal legal protection of their right to be represented by unions of their own choosing. Throughout the southern United States, the evasion and repression of the organizational rights of workers is the established pattern.

We have helped to bring about a more equitable distribution of the nation's wealth. Yet we still have a tax structure that is loaded against the public interest, that benefits the rich at the expense of the average family.

We have helped millions of workers acquire a degree of job security, and material possessions of which they hardly dared dream 35 years ago—but the abrasions and stresses of daily life have multiplied.

We have helped to make education available to all. Yet the nation still underpays its teachers, crowds its pupils and gives false budgetary considerations priority over the quality of the educational system.

We have helped to transport a man to the moon, with split-second timing. Yet the nation's surface transportation system is a disaster area.

We have a mission today that extends far beyond the goals of wages, hours and working conditions. It is to try to improve the quality of our lives; to make it possible for everyone to have a life free from unemployment or low-paying dead-end jobs; free from bad housing and bad schools; free from the ignorance, hate and fear that stem from isolation from the mainstream of the human community, whether in the rural South, the northern slum or the burgeoning suburb.

A Word Edgewise:

Nixon's Defense of Haynsworth Poses Challenge to Liberals

By John P. Roche

ON OCT. 20 an interesting event took place at the White House, one that has not received the attention it merits. Pres. Nixon held an "informal meeting" with the White House correspondents to explore the controversial nomination of Judge Clement Haynsworth to the Supreme Court. Noting that he had had "some experience in investigations," the President demonstrated his mastery of the defense brief.

For those who have never examined a defense brief, it might be worth while to set out the organizational principle: always reserve a fall-back position. For example, in defending a man accused of murder, a good lawyer will argue: 1. He didn't do it. 2. If he did it, he was temporarily insane. 3. If he wasn't insane, it was self defense. 4. If it wasn't self defense, it was an accident. 5. He is a fine man, a decorated veteran with a loving wife and five children, who should be treated with compassion.

Mr. Nixon's version of this flexible response indicated that Judge Haynsworth was not guilty of conflict of interest, that his conflicts were not substantial, that he was a victim of "guilt by association and character assassination of the very worst type," and that it was improper for senators to vote against Haynsworth because of the latter's "philosophy," and that the "philosophy" was excellent.

The whole notion of conflict of interest is intellectually murky. Admittedly, it has a certain primitive utility: if you catch an official with huge interests in an air-space business slipping contracts to his buddies, you can take him out of circulation. But he would have to be rather stupid to play that game.

On the other hand, the conflict of interest technique can't reach the man who owns no stock but has spent his working life among those who do and who quite sincerely believes that (to paraphrase a former Secretary of Defense) what is good for their business is good for the United States.

Let us leave conflict of interest, then, to the auditors and snoops and turn to Pres. Nixon's handling of Haynsworth's "philosophy." Here he took two internally contradictory positions and got away with it.

First, he suggested that Haynsworth's philosophy was not properly before the Senate, and adduced in evidence (1) Senate approval of Thurgood Marshall, (2) Senate debate over Louis D. Brandeis and Charles Evans Hughes. It is unclear what these cases prove. The only reason the Southerners didn't block Marshall's appointment was they didn't have the votes; anti-Semitism nurtured the opposition to Brandeis, and those who opposed Hughes in 1930 on the ground he was too conservative (and old—68) were right.

Second, Mr. Nixon did a quick logical shift and flatly stated that "if Judge Haynsworth's philosophy leans to the conservative side, in my view that recommends him to me. I think the court needs balance . . . a man who is conservative . . . in respect of his attitude towards the Constitution." Then came the code message: "It is the judge's responsibility, and the Supreme Court's responsibility to interpret the Constitution . . . and not to go beyond that in putting his own socio-economic philosophy into decisions in a way that goes . . . beyond the Constitution."

CERTAIN POLITICAL formulations carry a lot of ideological ballast. "Law and order" is a good example. Even a Negro who has had his store robbed six times in three months will understandably vote against a white "law and order" candidate.

In the same fashion, for 15 years the Supreme Court has been attacked for substituting its "own socio-economic philosophy" for the law of the land. When? In desegregating the schools. By whom? The legalistic segregationists, who even demanded the impeachment of Earl Warren.

Thus Pres. Nixon, in defense of Haynsworth's "philosophy," has squarely challenged the liberals. Let us hope they will stop wavering and fight.

Appeals Court Rules:

GE Short-Circuits Bargaining With Boulwarism and Publicity

The following analysis of the U.S. Court of Appeals decision holding that General Electric's "Boulwarism" bargaining policy is unlawful is excerpted from a memorandum prepared by IUE General Counsel Irving Abramson.

THE ISSUES before the court were whether or not GE's method of negotiations commonly known as "Boulwarism" violated the law. The court was called upon to review the findings of the National Labor Relations Board that General Electric had violated the National Labor Relations Act by refusing to furnish the union necessary information; by presenting an offer on a take-it-or-leave-it basis, and dealing with the IUE through the local unions and its membership rather than dealing with the membership through the IUE.

After examining the techniques used by the company in negotiations, the court held that Boulwarism as it described it, was an unlawful method of negotiating with the union and directed the company to engage in genuine collective bargaining.

The court found that Boulwarism had two major facets: "first, a take-it-or-leave-it approach ('fair, firm offer') to negotiations in general which emphasized both the powerlessness and uselessness of the union to its members, and second, a communication program that pictured the company as the true defender of the employes' interests, further denigrating the union, and sharply curbing the company's ability to change its own position."

The court described negotiations under Boulwarism as one under which GE made the one and only proposal on a "take-it-or-leave-it" basis to be sold to the employes and the general public as a "product" using GE's highly successful consumer product merchandising techniques.

The product was sold through what the court described as "a veritable avalanche of publicity, reaching awesome proportions prior to and during negotiations," in the course of which GE utilized what the court said was a "vast network of plant newspapers, bulletins, letters, television and radio announcements and personal contacts through management personnel."

In criticizing the company's stiff and unbending attitude the court reminded the company that "a collective bargaining agreement is a compromise not only between the parties, but of their past, present, and future goals." The court warned the company that its method "creates divisive tensions within the union" and that "union democracy is not furthered by permitting the company to pick the union apart piece by piece."

The court found that ". . . the company's tactics seemed so clearly designed to show the employes that the union could win them nothing more than the company was prepared to offer, it is even more apparent that a unilateral offer—over which the union may not bargain—diminishes the rewards and the importance of the bargaining at the end of the contract period. Thus, the union's ability to function as a bargaining representative is seriously impaired. Indeed, such conduct amounts to a declaration on the part of the company that not only the union, but the process of collective bargaining itself may be dispensed with."

The company's attitude and policy during negotiations was described by the court as "a stiff and unbending posture hardly consistent with common willingness among the parties to discuss freely and fully their respective claims and demands and when they are opposed, to justify them on reason."

The court upheld the trial examiner's finding that GE chose to rely on its communication program "to the virtual exclusion of general negotiations which it sought to evade by any means possible," bypassing the national negotiators in favor of direct dealing with employes and local officials. The aim, the court said, "was to deal with the union through the employes, rather than with the employes through the union."

The court condemned the company's refusal to withhold publicizing its offer until the union has had an opportunity to propose suggested modifications. The reason for the company's posture, the court stated, was that: "The command of Boulware approach was clear; employes and the general public must be barraged with communications that emphasized the generosity of the offer and restated the firmness of GE's position."

THE COURT REMINDED GE that what it should have done if it had a genuine desire to reach an agreement was to await union comments "before taking a stand from which it would be difficult to retreat." The most severe indictments of General Electric's uncompromising attitude was stated in the following language: "The company, having created a view of the bargaining process that admitted of no compromise, was trapped by its own creation. It could no longer seek peace without total victory, for it had by its own words and actions branded any compromise a defeat."

The court directed the employer to avoid conduct by which it combines its "take-it-or-leave-it" bargaining methods with a widely publicized stance of unbending firmness that it is unable to alter a position once taken.

The court charitably portrayed GE as one who displays "a patronizing attitude toward union negotiators inconsistent with a genuine desire to reach a mutually satisfactory accord."

Finally, GE's unreasoning posture and its irrational insistence on supporting unreasonable positions which it did not even believe, received judicial recognition in the following finding by the court: "GE occasionally took untenable and unreasonable positions and then defended them, with no apparent purpose other than to avoid yielding to the union."

Lives Traded for Dollars:

Toll of On-the-Job Accidents Grows into 'Horrible Situation'

ONLY THE FULL COMMITMENT of government, labor and the public can correct the "horrible situation" caused by the absence of the U.S. industrial health and safety standards, a former official of the Labor Dept. said.

The number and rate of job-related deaths, disabilities and injuries are growing, declared Esther Peterson, who is now legislative representative for the Clothing Workers.

Even the officially reported daily toll of 55 killed, 8,000 disabled and 27,000 otherwise injured in on-the-job accidents is undoubtedly "understated," because of the looseness of the present reporting system.

And, she stressed, there are no statistics at all on "how many people every day breathe certain substances" and are exposed to chemicals that may eventually cause sickness, disability or death. Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, Mrs. Peterson called for a stiff, comprehensive, federal job-safety law. She declined to speculate on the cost of such a law.

"I don't think you put a dollar tag on life," she asserted. That is the "human side—and you can't measure that in dollars and cents," she said.

But, she stressed, it is important to know the cost of job-related accidents, which, she said, trim the gross national product by more than $7 billion yearly. She noted that in addition, more than $1.5 billion in wages are lost, "to say nothing of the compensation payments that are made."

MRS. PETERSON said the Occupational Safety & Health bill sponsored by Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), and Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.), is stronger and better than the legislation proposed by the Administration. She said the Administration-backed measure has a "number of principal weaknesses," among them, placing standard-setting authority in a board. That can be a long and "cumbersome" procedure, she said.

She noted that the labor movement is urging that Congress give "the Secretary of Labor the responsibility of setting standards . . . a method that can be used quickly."

HOW FAR CAN A U.S. SENATOR go before he crosses the great divide and is involved in a conflict of interest?

This question must be raised in two great issues now before the Senate—one the confirmation of a justice to the Supreme Court and the other on tax justice or tax reform.

In the former case we have a U.S. senator, Sam J. Ervin, Jr., of North Carolina, acting as a chief defender of Pres. Nixon's nominee for the high court, Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr.

One of the charges placed against Haynsworth is that he covertly held $450,000 stock interest in a vending firm—which did at least $100,000 annual business with the Deering-Milliken textile chain—at the time he ruled for the chain and against the union. Haynsworth, as Chief Judge of the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals, held that Deering-Milliken could shut down the Darlington Mill after its workers had voted for the Textile Workers Union of America.

The Supreme Court unanimously overturned the Haynsworth decision. "Chilling" unionism, the high court declared, was for all practical purposes union-busting.

Presenting the Deering-Milliken case to the Supreme Court three years ago was none other than Ervin. The North Carolina senator, along with Haynsworth, has had a long tie with the textile industry. That he should emerge as a chief defender of Haynsworth on the Senate Judiciary Committee raised a question of ethics.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany suggested to Ervin that he had tried the case before the Supreme Court in 1966 and lost and saw little value in another presentation of his case.

Ervin bristled, stood up and shouted that he had not received a single cent from Deering-Milliken since he handled their case.

Attorney Irving Abramson, representing Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Workers, was even more blunt. He said that since conflict of interest is a pivotal issue in determining Haynsworth's qualifications, members of the Judiciary Committee themselves must be "free of any appearance of a conflict of interest or a pre-determined bias. . . ."

Looking directly at Ervin he urged "that any such committee member disqualify himself from passing on the qualifications of the nominee."

Ervin did not answer. He laughed, indicating he felt that the suggestion was utterly ridiculous.

While all of this was going on, the Associated Press dug up some revealing data on Sen. Russell Long (D-La.), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee which is currently considering tax legislation.

The committee has been considering the House-passed provision that would cut back the millionaire-creating oil depletion allowance from 27.5 percent to 20 percent.

WHILE LABOR and consumer groups, in the interest of tax justice, would like to wipe out this tax bonanza entirely, the House action in cutting it back did represent some progress.

Long has been an outspoken defender of the oil industry. "A long time ago," he said, "I became convinced that if you have financial interests completely parallel to your state, then you have no problem. My state produces more gas and oil per acre than any other state in the Union. If I didn't represent the oil and gas industry, I wouldn't represent the State of Louisiana."

But Long also represents millions of other citizens in his state who do not profit from millionaires' oil tax bonanzas—the workers will have to pay heavier taxes to the U.S. Treasury to make up for what the oil operators gain.

In the last five and one-half years, according to the Louisiana Mineral Board records, Long received an income of $1,196,915 from four state oil and gas leases.

Of this, $329,151 was in the tax-exempted portion—he paid no taxes on it.

The cases of both Ervin and Long demonstrate that Congress should act more decisively in ethics and conflict of interest fields.

THE "HORRIBLE SITUATION" of today's on-the-job health and safety was scored by Clothing Workers Legislative Rep. Esther Peterson, center, on Labor News Conference. The former Assistant Secretary of Labor was questioned by Stanley Levey, left, of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Morton Mintz of the Washington Post. The AFL-CIO interview is heard Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on Mutual Radio.

How to Buy:

New Safeguards for Consumers Emerge with Class Action Suits

By Sidney Margolius

A NEW WAY you can be protected from unfair treatment by sellers is emerging as the result of several court decisions.

This powerful weapon against gouges is "class action" suits. These are court suits filed by community organizations or local government agencies on behalf of a whole group or class of consumers.

The usefulness of class actions is that often moderate-income families are unable to fight back against gouges because the amount involved in an individual court action may be too small to warrant hiring a lawyer. Or they may take a fatalistic attitude, figuring that the law is on the side of the seller (which often has been true but is changing), and they will have to pay anyway.

But when a community group or agency can bring a suit, even if it is not the party who was gouged, victories can be won on behalf of the entire public.

(The Nixon Administration's proposed consumer program would allow class action suits in federal courts but with certain limitations. Such suits could not be filed until after the government had successfully prosecuted a company or won a consent agreement.)

In one of the most significant class actions this year, the Supreme Court ruled against a Wisconsin law which allowed creditors to garnishee without first proving in court that a valid debt exists. The action had been brought by the NAACP Legal Defense Fund on behalf of a Wisconsin woman. Her wages had been garnisheed by the Family Finance Corp., without a hearing.

Under the Wisconsin law, the woman's employer was required to pay half of her wages ($63.18 a week) to the finance company.

The state courts ruled in favor of the finance company. But the U.S. Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Douglas, ruled that the state law really did deprive the woman of her right to a hearing first, and to offer any defense such as fraud or deception by the original seller.

Another recent example was a class suit filed on July 1, the day the truth-in-lending law went into effect, by a New York Consumer Protection Union. It charged that a store had sold the group's educational director a television set without specifying that the annual interest rate would be 18 percent.

Now government agencies conscious of the need to protect consumers, are beginning to look to such "class actions" as a major way to stop exploitation, especially of low-income families who usually can't afford to say hello to a lawyer, let alone fight a case through successive courts.

In New York, Consumer Commissioner Bess Myerson Grant is urging the city council to enact a consumer protection act giving her power to sue dishonest sellers in the name of any consumer victimized as part of a pattern of deception. Under the law she seeks, the city could sue for the consumer and return all money to others who were similarly victimized.

The Rhode Island Consumer's Council, an official agency, already has used the state's recently-adopted Unfair Practices Act to get court injunctions against practices by car repair, furnace installation and home cleaning firms. Edwin Palumbo, the council's director, points out that the Council used the cases of individual consumers to stop the practices in general.

FOR EXAMPLE, in one court case the Council complained that advertisements by the Interstate Transmission Co. led a car owner to believe he would get a free inspection or estimate. But, the judge found, the repair company did not tell the car owner what steps were necessary to inspect or estimate, nor that the transmission in his car would be disassembled and not reassembled in its previous condition.

The usefulness of "class actions" in the defense of your own family against gouges will be greatly enhanced if Congress passes the "Consumer Class Action Bill" introduced by Sen. Joseph D. Tydings (D-Md.). The bill would let consumers or organizations bring class actions in federal court regardless of where they live or the amount involved.

At present, federal courts only can take suits involving parties in more than one state. In testifying for the bill, Mrs. Grant called it "one of the most powerful instruments of economic justice which the Senate has ever considered."

Linked to Planning:

Retirement Income Key to Satisfaction

MOST RETIRED AMERICANS are satisfied with life after retirement, but it depends largely on retirement income.

The study, made by Richard E. Barfield and James N. Morgan of the Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan Institute for Social Research, found that about three-fourths of retirees are satisfied with life after retirement and that there are strong indications that the proportion of people retiring early will increase.

"Early Retirement: The Decision and the Experience," as the report is titled, is based on interviews with older automobile workers and a representative sample of the national population as a whole.

The report emphasizes that financial factors—primarily expected retirement income—are of major importance in the retirement decision. Health, on-the-job satisfactions, ability to enjoy leisure activity, and social attitudes toward retirement also are significantly related to retirement planning.

For both national and auto worker samples, there was found a "threshold" level of retirement income which most people seem to consider necessary to insure a reasonably adequate post-retirement living standard. Currently, this level is about $4,000 a year.

Persons seeing their health as relatively declining were more likely to express plans for early retirement. Among those who had retired, many reported the feeling that their health had improved after retirement.

PEOPLE WHO looked forward to enjoying recreational activities —hobbies, sports, travel—were substantially more likely to ask for retirement before age 65. Persons who expressed dissatisfaction with their job were more responsive to the idea of early retirement, as were those whose commitment to the "work ethic" seemed somewhat tenuous.

"Evidence from the national sample part leads one to believe that, during the last five or six years, there has been some tendency for early retirement planning to become more common," Barfield and Morgan write.

"It is likely, then, that more and more early retirees will be people who planned for early retirement and are financially prepared for it. The result is likely to be an increasing discrepancy among the retired, between those who retired as they had planned to and those who retired unexpectedly, often without planning and hence in most cases with inadequate retirement incomes."

Such financial discrepancies, the authors add, will probably be accentuated by the growth of private pension plans covering only some workers.

As an alternative they suggest that workers be allowed to make "voluntary supplemental contributions" to the social security system and thereby raise their retirement benefits.

The researchers emphasize their finding that "retirement can, apparently, be a genuinely satisfying time of life for many, if not most, people."

Soup to Nonsense:

'Compliments' from Youngsters Hold More Truth Than Flattery

By Jane Goodsell

ONE THING about compliments from children —you can be sure they're sincere. This isn't always true of adults who say nice things for a variety of reasons, some of which are pretty complicated.

"You're looking especially pretty tonight" may be a simple, spontaneous statement of opinion. Then again, the compliment-giver may be flattering you in the hope that you'll say something ego-boosting to her in return. Or she may be softening you up for a favor she is about to ask. She may mean, "Thank heaven, you took the trouble for once to comb your hair!" Or even, "I'm trying to cheer you up because you're so obviously dressed all wrong."

Compliments from kids aren't ever that complex. Kids mean exactly what they say. The trouble is, their compliments aren't always complimentary. Not from a grown-up point of view, anyway.

One young mother I know was having some dubious thoughts about her white opaque stockings which the salesclerk had assured her were "teddibly fashion-right." So she asked her small son if he liked them. He studied her legs judiciously. Then he flashed her an encouraging grin and said, "They're neat, Mom. Your legs look just like milk bottles."

THE POINT IS, that kid thought he was telling his mother something he thought she'd like to hear.

So did my daughter, Katy, some years back when she was three or four years old. I was dressed for a tea, and feeling self-conscious in my mother's sheared beaver hat which I'd borrowed for the occasion. Seeking reassurance, I asked Katy how I looked. She gazed at me, enraptured and said, "Oh, Mommy, it's beautiful! You look like Davy Crockett!"

When kids pass judgment on food, it's not always easy to tell a compliment from an insult. One little boy who dropped in at our house for an afternoon snack, told me, "Gee, Mrs. Goodsell, this is the soggiest cake I've ever eaten!" That had to be a compliment because he ate three big pieces.

Conversely, a little girl who pronounced her cup custard "real creamy" was expressing her distaste for it. It seemed that she preferred nice, watery custard like her mother made.

Some Points Criticized:

President Outlines Consumer Goals

The initial reaction to Pres. Nixon's consumer message to Congress was a mixture of praise for the program's objectives and criticism of its weaknesses.

Nixon said the "consumer rights" would help provide "greater personal freedom for individuals as well as better business for everyone engaged in trade."

The President proposed:

- A new office of consumer affairs to be established by legislation, with an expanded budget and greater responsibilities to "give every American consumer a permanent voice in the White House."
- A new division of consumer protection in the Justice Dept. "to act as a consumer advocate before federal regulatory agencies."
- A new consumer protection law to be enforced by the Justice Dept.
- A revitalized Federal Trade Commission with expanded powers.
- A national commission on consumer finance and credit.
- Expanded consumer education activities including product information and government reports.
- Thorough re-examination of the Food & Drug Administration and stronger efforts on food and drug safety.

Nixon also disclosed that a previously proposed Administration bill to allow class action suits in federal courts will include certain limitations. The new provision would allow private citizens to bring these damage suits against businessmen only after the government has successfully prosecuted a company or won a consent agreement.

This limitation would "prevent harassment of legitimate businessmen by unlimited nuisance lawsuits," Nixon said.

That proviso was sharply criticized by proponents of a stronger measure for class action suits.

Stronger Bill Proposed

Rep. Robert C. Eckhardt, (D-Tex.), who is sponsoring a stronger consumer bill with Sen. Joseph D. Tydings (D-Md.), said it is better for consumers to initiate their own remedies.

Nixon said the proposed new White House Consumer Affairs Office would be headed by Mrs. Virginia Knauer, who now serves as his aide in the consumer field. Her office currently exists only through presidential order.

The four buyers' rights outlined in the presidential message are:

- The right to make an intelligent choice among products and services.
- The right to accurate information on which to make a choice.
- The right to expect health and safety.
- The right to register dissatisfaction and to have complaints heard.

Former Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare, Wilbur J. Cohen, called Nixon's overall proposal "incomplete—in the way he's transmitted it to Congress."

"What we need to do is to lengthen and broaden it," Cohen told the National Consumers League at its 70th anniversary conference.

He suggested the formation of a Council of Consumer Advisers that might parallel the duties of Council of Economic Advisers. The three-member council would be charged with enforcing certain consumer protection legislation now handled by the Federal Trade Commission.

"I believe that the public would be best served by transferring these important functions from an old controversial agency to a new dynamic agency," Cohen said.

Panelists at the Consumers League conference stressed that much more must be done for the consumer—both as a buyer and as a worker.

They insisted that the consumer deserves more accurate product information and greater government protection. But, they noted, what is achieved for the consumer will depend on his demands.

James S. Turner, a consultant for the Center for the Study of Responsive Law, labeled Nixon's consumer legislation proposal "a misleading and misbranded package."

No Real 'Rights'

He told the league that the proposal offers no real "rights" to accurate product information, health and safety, full choice of products and services and full airing of complaints.

Dir. Bert Seidman, of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security surveyed the problems of the poor as consumers. He said people are poor for many different reasons and that there is no single panacea for curing the ills of poverty.

Seidman called on the federal government to expand a battery of social programs including welfare reforms, improvements in workmen's compensation benefits, a higher minimum wage and jobs for all who are able.

The country acknowledged the existence of poverty in the 1960s, Seidman told the league, and it is the challenge of the '70s to solve it. He reiterated labor's stand for an immediate doubling of social security benefits to ease the economic plight of the elderly.

Union Backs Scout Troop For Retarded

Hershey, Pa.—Boy Scout Troop 464 has a special number and a special job to do.

Sponsored and manned by American Bakery & Confectionery Workers Local 464, the troop works strictly with retarded boys and youths with educational difficulties.

The troop was launched in September with the assistance of the Hershey area Tri-County United Fund agencies as a part of the local's community services program.

Except for Scoutmaster Cecil Trout, a veteran scouting volunteer, the troop is directed by members of the local.

The boys range in age from 12 to 16 and meet at the ABC local hall for their troop activities.

"This is a homogeneous group of boys with a common problem," said district scouting executive Dan Ruth. "It's important to have patience and understanding" in working with them, he added.

"Actually, the boys can pick up typical scouting skills faster than academic skills," Ruth noted, "and the lesson they learn as troop members may be useful in their eventual employment."

The young scout troop has already gone on several camping trips and constructed a float for the Hershey Halloween parade, reported troop committee chairman Clyde Keller.

Other ABC local members on the troop committee are Lloyd Flory, Richard Fogelman and Ferdinand Nimez. The local's community services chairman is Paul Brunner.

'States' Rights' Myths Seen Blocking Treaties

A committee of 15 distinguished attorneys, headed by former Supreme Court Justice Tom C. Clark, has exploded the "states' rights" argument used to block U.S. ratification of International Labor Organization and United Nations' agreements.

The findings add force to the stand of the AFL-CIO in its persistent appeal to the Senate to ratify ILO treaties—known as conventions—dealing with genocide, forced labor, women's political rights and freedom of association.

The lawyers' committee was established by the President's Commission for the Observance of Human Rights Year 1968, headed by former Ambassador W. Averell Harriman. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and AFL-CIO Vice President A. Philip Randolph were members of the commission.

The committee spent more than a year examining conventions in the light of the Constitution and judicial, congressional and diplomatic precedents covering treaties.

In a report to Pres. Nixon, the committee said that "no support whatsoever can be found" for any argument that the Constitution limits the scope of the federal government's treaty-making power.

"Matters within the scope of the treaty-making power cannot lie within the exclusive domain of the states," the committee said. "This doctrine has been clear from the very founding of the Republic."

The committee also examined the conventions on one other basis—whether or not they are a matter of "international concern" to the United States. This test for treaties has been set in Supreme Court decisions going back many years.

"Treating the test of 'international concern' as a constitutional limitation," the report stated, "it is clear that no objection to ratification of all human rights treaties can be rested on this basis.

"This country, long ago and repeatedly, has recognized that human rights are of international concern, and are therefore within the scope of U.S. treaty-making power."

The committee termed it "anachronistic" that any challenge should be raised to ratifying human rights conventions "since this country used the treaty power to become a party to the United Nations Charter, one of whose basic purposes is the promotion of human rights for all."

In a letter to Harriman, Clark deplored the fact that the United States has ratified only two of more than a score of human rights conventions to come before it. He reiterated the finding that there is no legal barrier to such ratifications.

In forwarding the report to Nixon, Harriman emphasized that the federal government "must recognize its commitment to human rights" policies and programs.

"A touchstone of our commitment will be the ratification of additional human rights conventions through action by the Administration and the Senate," he declared.

The lawyers' views coincide with those expressed by the recent AFL-CIO convention in a resolution stressing that "the so-called sanctity of 'states' rights' can no longer serve as an excuse for Senate failure to ratify these conventions."

Coalition Asks National Plan On Health Care

The Urban Coalition of labor, religious, business, civil rights and government leaders has called for a national system of financing medical care costs for all Americans.

In a report prepared by its health task force, the coalition stressed that such a system must remove all "economic barriers" to access to medical services.

Most of the report, based on an extensive study by the task force, centered on the need for cooperation by labor, business, medical and business groups at the community level in expanding health care.

However, the report said these efforts must be supplemented and strengthened by effective action taken by the federal government.

The task force study found that more than 45 percent of the U.S. population suffers from one or more chronic illnesses, and the incidence of such illnesses among the poor is more than four times greater than it is for the nation as a whole.

The study also found that the ratio of doctors to ghetto residents is from one-fifth to one-half of that for the city as a whole.

The coalition decried the lack of participation of the poor in health planning and urged that they be given more representation on hospital boards and health councils.

Labor Challenge in '70s Theme of TV Production

"The Challenge of the '70s to Labor," this year's television production of the George Meany Foundation, will be presented Sunday, Nov. 16, on the NBC-TV Network.

The format of the production will be a discussion of the role the trade union movement must play in the next decade. Participants will be David Cole, nationally-known labor arbitrator, and Msgr. George G. Higgins, director of the Division for Urban Life of the U.S. Catholic Conference. Rabbi Bernard Mandelbaum, president of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, will moderate the discussion.

The program will be incorporated into the Eternal Light Series, presented weekly by NBC-TV and the seminary. The George Meany Foundation is an arm of the seminary's Herbert H. Lehman Institute.

Network broadcast time for this year's production is 12:30 p.m., EST. Local television schedules should be consulted for areas outside New York City.

Indian Students Briefed on Jobs

St. Paul, Minn.—Minnesota labor organizations brought 43 Indian high school students to Minneapolis and St. Paul for a three-day orientation on job and career opportunities.

The Indian students from throughout the state visited colleges, vocational and technical schools, industrial plants, a television station and the post office.

Sponsors of the tour included the 625 affiliated union locals of the Minnesota AFL-CIO, the Labor Committee for Minnesota Indian Youth, Minnesota Labor Committee for Human Rights and the Jewish Labor Committee.

This is the 12th consecutive year the state labor federation has sponsored the all-expense-paid tour.

HARLEM YOUNGSTERS quickly get into the swing of things as a new mini-park is opened by the Clothing Workers in New York City. Participating in the dedication were, from left in the background, Mrs. Mary Iemma, Upper Park Avenue Community Association; Pres. Harry Van Arsdale of New York City AFL-CIO; Mrs. Margaret Jenkins, UPACA; Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of ACWA, and Treas. William H. Bowe of the city labor council. The facility is one of two mini-parks built by the union from $40,000 contributed by ACWA members.

Job Rights of Returning Veterans Protected by Key Court Rulings

More than 900,000 U.S. servicemen will be returning to their jobs this year with their rehiring rights, seniority and pay protected by a series of comprehensive court rulings, the American Federationist reports.

Even without the recently announced troop withdrawals and cutbacks, young Americans have been finishing their military service in increasing numbers, two members of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research report in the October issue of the federation's official magazine.

Economist Rudolph Oswald and Research Assistant J. Douglas Smith note in "The Veteran Returns to the Job" that the number of returning veterans has increased by more than 300,000 over the returnees of 1967.

There should be similarly large numbers of new veterans in 1970, they say, because of the high draft quotas of two years ago.

The authors note that veterans returning to jobs they held before entering the service have reemployment rights which are protected by law.

"Those rights could be summarized roughly as guaranteeing the veteran the same status he would have enjoyed had he remained on the job," they say. "Details of veterans' reemployment rights are evolving with each new court decision."

At the base of the veteran's rehiring rights are the Military Selective Service Act of 1967 and predecessor laws beginning with the Selective Training & Service Act of 1940.

The 1967 act requires employers to restore veterans to the position they held before entering service, or to another position of like seniority, status and pay. In general, the authors find, these rights cover only those veterans whose service time does not exceed four years.

Since enactment of the 1940 act, they note, the federal courts have gradually pinpointed the veteran's seniority and fringe benefit rights. These decisions have had "major implications for the rights of veterans to promotions, special status as probationary employes, severance pay, vacation benefits, pensions, supplementary unemployment benefits (SUB), and other benefits based on seniority," the article says.

"In many cases veterans now enjoy rights not usually extended to nonveterans" who get a leave of absence from their job, according to the article. The authors add:

"During the next few years many veterans will be returning from Viet Nam to claim these reemployment rights. Moreover, World War II veterans are becoming increasingly concerned about their right to severance pay and pensions. Thus the interpretations the federal courts have made on the seniority rights of veterans take on more importance."

The authors cite these major decisions on the subject of veterans' rights:

- The Supreme Court ruled in Fishgold v. Sullivan Drydock, 1946, that a veteran is entitled not only to the precise seniority status he had before entering the service, but also to the improvements he would have received had he not taken military leave.

This declaration, which became known as "the escalator principle," was adopted by Congress in the Selective Service Act of 1948. It remained "little more than a general statement of policy" until the court clarified it in other decisions.

- In McKinney v. M-K-T Railroad, 1958, the Supreme Court held that a veteran is entitled to a promotion which he missed while in service only if that promotion would have been automatic under the terms of the union agreement on seniority.
- In 1964 the top court clarified the McKinney case language when it ruled in Tilton v. Missouri Pacific Railroad that other disqualifications because of unavailability or sickness cannot deprive a veteran of his seniority rights.

The magazine lists other leading decisions by U.S. courts at all levels, and a "significant" decision in a U.S. Steel case involving the Steelworkers. In it, the arbiter ruled that a veteran is entitled to permanent assignment to a higher-rated job he would have attained, with a seniority date as of the time he would have been selected for it if he were not on leave.

The authors point out that some unions have negotiated contract clauses which go beyond the requirements of the law but generally, they say, union contracts "simply afford veterans the same rights federal law allows."

Air Line Dispatchers Study Merger, Growth

Las Vegas—Delegates to the Air Line Dispatchers 27th convention here established two committees to make studies and recommendations relating to the union's future.

One committee will look into the possibility of ALDA merging with another union in the airline industry. The second group will study possible expansion of ALDA's headquarters. Both will report to the union's board of directors by mid-January.

ALDA Pres. Robert E. Commerce pointed out that the committee looking into possible merger might recommend against merger. However, he noted that the union is "at a point of decision" on its future course.

The union, among the smallest in the AFL-CIO, represents highly-skilled operations control specialists on airlines, and much of the convention was devoted to discussion of flight problems.

Delegates re-elected John H. Steele of National Airlines to another five-year term as vice president. Commerce, Sec.-Treas. James Boyd and four other vice presidents were not up for re-election.

Speakers included Executive Sec.-Treas. Peter M. McGavin of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.; Pres. D'Arcy Kennedy of the Canadian Air Line Dispatchers Association; Dr. Chaytor Mason, aviation psychologist, University of Southern California; and Harold Piper, a management representative from the Boeing Co., Seattle.

Harsh Effects Noted:

Transport Trades To Probe Mergers

The Conference of Transportation Trades announced it will launch a continuing study to develop ways of protecting workers and the public against the harsh effects of corporate mergers.

The decision was made during a one-day meeting in Washington of the general board of the conference, which is composed of 27 AFL-CIO unions with 4.5 million workers in all modes of transportation. The conference is headed by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. C. L. Dennis, who also is president of the Railway & Airline Clerks.

In another action, the board adopted a far-ranging report dealing with major problems facing transportation industries and expressing the conference's views on solving them.

The resolution calling for the study of corporate mergers noted that the rising tide of business mergers has reached the stage where some 200 corporations, out of about 200,000 in the United States, "control nearly 60 percent of the country's manufacturing wealth."

This has happened, the resolution pointed out, because of the growth of "conglomerate" mergers—those that cut across industry lines with emphasis "on monopoly control of the American economic system."

The resolution noted that the conglomerates pose a particular danger to labor because "the more diverse a company's business interests, the less pressure unions are able to bring in the collective bargaining process."

Noting that in the past transportation managements have not always responded to transportation needs, the resolution warned:

"When conglomerates invade the transportation field, and when corporate decisions are handed over to financiers whose concerns are solely economic, the American people will find management even less responsive to the transportation needs of the nation.

"It would be possible, under such circumstances, to close down the transportation segment of the conglomerate solely for tax advantage or similar economic gain—and the American people will be the losers."

The report on problems facing the transportation industries covered a wide range of topics dealing with economics, labor relations and the future outlook of all domestic and international modes of transportation.

The report, "Transportation: A Time to Move Ahead," noted that although problems "vary greatly between various modes" there are some "common threads" that run through the entire industry.

These are highlights in three areas of common concern as expressed in the report:

Safety—Occupational injuries and deaths are on the rise because managements have not voluntarily taken steps "to make the workplace safe and healthy." The conference backed legislation sought by the AFL-CIO to require federal health and safety standards.

Automation—The conference seeks to work with employers to develop "intelligent approaches" to introducing automation so that workers can retain their dignity and their purchasing power, "which is as vital to the entire economy as to the individual worker."

Pollution — It was noted that "man cannot live without air and water, yet in America today, we seem bent on squandering both."

An entire section of the report detailed the way in which the transportation industry is contributing to pollution.

The conference pledged its continued support of the efforts of the labor movement and others to halt the destruction of natural resources "before the spoilers destroy our environment, and in the process destroy us all."

Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.), speaking at a luncheon held by the board, took a firm stand against compulsory arbitration in labor management relations—particularly in the transportation industry.

Whenever the government steps in to bar strikes in an industry, Hartke declared, it becomes the "invisible partner" of management which knows it is protected "against the economic consequences of its own intransigence at the bargaining table."

Draft Lottery Proposal Approved in House Bill

The House voted 382-13 approval of a limited draft reform bill, under a procedure which barred consideration of more far-reaching amendments.

The House bill would make only one change in the Selective Service Act. It would repeal a section that prohibits the President from changing the method of selection of men for military service.

Pres. Nixon has said that if the law were changed, he would order that 19-year-olds be drafted first through a "lottery" system of random selection.

Without the law change, the President can still require that priority be given to 19-year-olds, but the choice among that age group would remain in the hands of local draft boards.

A bipartisan group of House members had sought to change the rule under which the House took up the bill so as to permit amendments to other sections of the Selective Service Act, ranging from proposals to eliminate college deferments to establishment of an all-volunteer army.

The parliamentary move to open up the basic draft law for amendments was beaten, however, 265-129.

When the last overhaul of the draft law was before Congress, in 1967, the AFL-CIO urged elimination of education deferments as such because they "clearly discriminate against sons of low income families." The federation opposed substitution of a voluntary army as impractical.

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield said after the House action that he didn't think the Senate would take up the bill this year.

But later he said prospects for action are "looking up" on the basis of a compromise suggested by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.). Kennedy proposed advancing the expiration date of the draft law by six months—to Jan. 1, 1971. This would assure Congress of an opportunity to amend the basic draft law in the next session, he said.

Convention Renews Mandate:

Lithographers Ask Graphic Arts Unity

Atlantic City—Appeals for the merger of all unions in the printing industry featured sessions of the third biennial convention of the Lithographers & Photoengravers.

Emphasis on the need for merger to solve problems created by rapid technological advancement came from Pres. Kenneth J. Brown who said LPIU is living proof that "unity works in the graphic arts."

The union, created by a 1964 merger, backed him up by renewing a previous mandate that its officers "consult and explore" avenues for merger with all other graphic arts unions.

The 254 delegates from 123 locals also warmly welcomed an announcement from Pres. John Connolly of the Bookbinders that his union's convention had instructed its officers to hold merger discussions with LPIU.

Connolly said discussions on a possible merger would begin soon and he voiced hope that "in the reasonable future, we'll have one big union in the printing trades."

In deliberations and through reports, the convention reviewed skill training programs, early retirement plans, legislative and political action activities and wage settlements negotiated since the 1967 convention.

Major actions included:

- Approval of a 50-cent per capita tax increase, the first since the merger, to meet increasing costs of operations and further organizing drives.
- Authorization for the officers to move the union's headquarters from New York to Washington, D.C.
- An increase in weekly strike benefits from $50 to $60 for the first four weeks of a strike, and $70 a week thereafter "for the duration," and a boost in the top limit for the union's emergency defense fund from $3 to $4 million.
- Authorization of a fulltime technical expert on the union's staff to advise and aid the international office and locals in meeting the challenges of technological advances in the industry.

A message to the delegates from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany extended his "warm, fraternal greetings" and praised the merged union for having established an "enviable record."

"I have watched LPIU accomplishments with special interest," Meany said. "Your contracts are the best in history, your organizing has moved steadily forward; your education, training and retraining programs are well launched."

The convention also received messages from Pres. Nixon, Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz and Canadian Minister of Labor Bryce Mackasey.

Nixon said the union's "enlightened policies" in the graphic arts industry "present to the nation a most commendable example of forward thinking."

Shultz praised the union for its contribution to human progress through its joint union-employer training programs. Mackasey saluted the union's progressive collective bargaining policies.

Convention speakers included John Bonfield, general secretary of the National Graphical Association, a union in Great Britain that was formed by the merger of six graphic arts unions in 1964—the same year as the LPIU was formed.

Affiliation Welcome

Bonfield, who also is president of the International Graphic Federation, welcomed the LPIU's recent affiliation with the trade secretariat as "one of the greatest accessions of strength IGF has ever had."

Donald MacDonald, president of the Canadian Labor Congress, spoke on the "great need for unions to work together and consolidate where possible" to meet one of labor's greatest threats in its history—conglomerate business mergers.

"The political implications are frightening to contemplate from these gargantuan forces," he said. "Their interests are diametrically opposed to labor."

Three leaders of graphic arts unions in Japan were guests of the convention as part of the State and Labor Departments' cultural exchange program. Two LPIU leaders recently visited Japan under the program.

The convention collected $800 from delegates for the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee's striking grape workers. The collection was marked by an equal amount the delegates unanimously voted to be given from the LPIU treasury.

The letter and spirit of the merger agreement was followed in all votes taken by the convention to give minority photoengravers an "equal voice" with majority lithographers in determining policies.

LPIU's 10 international officers were nominated without opposition for additional two-year terms, commencing Feb. 15, 1970. Locals have a period of 35 days after the convention to make additional nominations, with the voting to take place in referendum conducted by the locals.

ADVANCEMENT made by the Lithographers & Photoengravers since the union was formed by a 1964 merger proves "that unity works in the graphic arts industry," Pres. Kenneth J. Brown told 254 delegates to the LPIU's third biennial convention in Atlantic City.

Agents Ratify 3-Year Pact At Prudential

The Insurance Workers ratified a new three-year contract giving 17,000 Prudential Life Insurance agents in 34 states a package of improved wage and fringe benefits valued at $16.29 a week. The union bargains for about 9,000 members and 8,000 "free riders" who pay no dues.

The union called the agreement the "best ever written" with Prudential, containing double the amount won in any prior contract. IWIU Vice Pres. Joseph Pollack headed the negotiating committee.

Members had voted by nearly 9-1 to authorize a strike, but a walkout was averted a few hours after expiration of the old contract. For the first time, union negotiators unanimously recommended settlement.

The final vote to ratify was 5,516 for, 974 against.

The new contract raises commissions and expense allowances by $15.12 a week. Improvements in major medical insurance and hospital coverage are valued at $1.08 a week and miscellaneous items 9 cents. The major medical limit was raised to $100,000.

A maintenance of union membership clause—the first step toward union security in any Prudential contract—headed a list of improvements in working conditions. Also won was a measure of protection against management's writing of business on an agent's debit, or territory; some protection against debit cutting, and elimination of language restricting an agent's weekend activities.

$610 Million Authorized for Food Stamps

The House cleared the way for more federal funds for the food stamp program by suspending its rules to authorize $610 million this fiscal year—up from last year's $340 million ceiling.

The Senate earlier had approved a $750 million authorization, but agreed to accept the House figure, which the Agriculture Dept. said was the most that it could use in the balance of the fiscal year.

Passage of the authorization bill clears the way for Congress to complete action on the Agriculture Dept. appropriations bill, which actually provides the money for the program.

Meanwhile, labor-backed legislation to reform and expand the food stamp program remained in the House Agriculture Committee.

At a recent hearing, the Meat Cutters urged quick action on the reform bill sponsored by Rep. Thomas S. Foley (D-Wash.) and 23 other congressmen. A similar bill has already been passed by the Senate.

Arnold Mayer, the union's legislative representative, told the committee that there is needless suffering in America because the nation has enough food and resources "to wipe out hunger completely."

Striking Meat Cutters Hit Firm's Propaganda

Sioux City, Ia.—Management of the strike-bound Iowa Beef Packers, Inc., has launched a "free and easy" propaganda campaign against its employes and their union, but it still refuses to pay the going wage for the meat packing industry, the Meat Cutters charged.

The union has been on strike at the company for 10 weeks, and has succeeded in cutting production to a trickle at four of the company's plants in Iowa and Nebraska. A resolution adopted by the recent AFL-CIO convention urged all union members to boycott the company's products.

In letters to the governors of Iowa, Nebraska and South Dakota, Meat Cutters Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman said the company's campaign has been "an attempt to evade its economic responsibilities to the people who do its work."

An accompanying statement charged that the firm enjoys the highest profit rate in the meat packing industry, but is paying less wages than most of its competitors.

More than 95 percent of the company's employes at the Dakota City, Neb., plant—the firm's largest—"are paid less than the common labor rate in other meat plants," the union said. "In fact, skilled maintenance workers there earn less than janitors in many packinghouses."

The union described as "fantastic" a charge by the company that butchers in the union's ranks in the East and West Coast areas are conspiring to "destroy" Iowa Beef Packers, which markets partially butchered beef cuts, as do most other meat packing companies.

"What the union can't accept and won't sanction," it declared, "are sub-standard pay rates aimed to enrich stockholders at the expense of workers' living standards." In 1968 Iowa Beef Packers made profit of 28 cents on each dollar of its net worth, a rate three times higher than the average for the meat industry and double the rate for manufacturing industry.

The union said the strike has sharply reduced Iowa Beef Packers' production at Dakota City and at three Iowa plants—Le Mars, Fort Dodge and Mason City.

Delaware Labor Spurs Wider Community Role

Wilmington—The Delaware AFL-CIO, stressing a wide range of objectives for labor's deeper involvement in community affairs, called for stiff state controls on pollution and urged improved hiring practices for minority groups.

The more than 300 delegates to the state labor council's 13th convention asked Gov. Russell W. Peterson to name a new advisory committee to the state water and air resources commission.

The current eight-member committee is heavily oriented toward the interests of large industries and is not representative of the state, the convention noted.

The convention also stressed the development of apprenticeship and training programs to improve job opportunities for Negroes and other minority workers.

Harold T. Bockman, a member of the Painters and former speaker of the state House of Representatives, was elected president without opposition. Bockman succeeds John A. Campanelli, who was serving as acting president following the death of Clement J. Lemon in September.

Campanelli was elected vice president and Charles C. Lemon, brother of the late president, was elected secretary-treasurer. Both also ran unopposed.

Other convention resolutions called for:

- An increase in the federal and state minimum wage to $2.50 an hour. The Delaware minimum wage is now $1.25.
- More safety inspectors for the state Dept. of Labor & Industrial Relations which employs only one inspector now.
- A letter-writing campaign asking the Senate to reject the nomination of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., as an associate justice of the Supreme Court.
- Establishment of a state consumer protection department.

26-Member Siderographers Study Merger

Fort Lee, N.J.—The Siderographers, a 70-year-old union of bank note and securities engravers, named a committee at their convention here to seek a closer working relationship that may lead to merger with the 76-year-old Printers, Die Stampers & Engravers.

Delegates representing the last 26 members of the declining craft of steel plate transfer engravers voted to raise per capita payments from $3 to $3.50 a month.

Pres. F. Warren Perkins said a merger committee was named to report back early in January on the advantages and disadvantages of joining with the 400-member plate printers, who also work on bank notes and securities.

The merger invitation was extended by the plate printers two years ago but no action was taken then. Members at this year's convention agreed that automation and new processes have thinned the ranks of a once-flourishing trade close to the vanishing point, the officers said.

Members work at the U.S. Bureau of Engraving & Printing in Washington, D.C., and for private securities firms in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, Los Angeles and Ottawa.

To End Poverty Among Aged:

50% Social Security Boost, Welfare Overhaul Pushed

the most pressing problems" faced by beneficiaries.

Particularly disappointing, Biemiller said was the Administration's "failure to substantially raise minimum benefits," the key to reducing poverty among those over 65.

The Administration bill would increase the present minimum from $55 to $61, whereas the Gilbert bill would provide an increase to $90 in January 1970 and $120 in January 1972.

The Gilbert provision for increasing the minimum, Biemiller said, would be "a notable advance" toward giving the poorest retired Americans "a significant measure of income."

Biemiller described the two 20 percent across-the-board increases in social security benefits provided for by Gilbert as "an essential part of a planned program to make our social security system fully adequate."

The first increase, effective Jan. 1, 1970, and the second boost, effective Jan. 1, 1972 "would lift the burden of poverty from our elderly population and provide them with a decent, comfortable living," he asserted.

Both measures would for the first time provide cost-of-living protection under social security. Biemiller said this step should be accompanied by a "clear public policy" for a regular upward adjustment in benefits periodically.

He termed Gilbert's proposed increase in the social security earnings base, from the present $7,800 a year to $15,000 over two years, "much more desirable" than the Administration's single increase to $9,000.

Biemiller said labor also "considers essential" a Gilbert provision to bring the government in on financing social security until the federal contribution is one-third in 1980, equaling the employer and worker contributions.

"This would effectively introduce the principle of progressive taxation into the social security program and distribute the social security tax burden more nearly in accordance with ability to pay," Biemiller testified.

On the subject of Medicare, he said the AFL-CIO "profoundly regrets the Administration did not make any major recommendations for basic improvements" in the program.

He called for expansion of Medicare to cover the cost of prescription drugs and include persons under 65 who are receiving disability benefits under social security. Both changes are part of the Gilbert measure.

The AFL-CIO also backed a Gilbert provision to finance the medical insurance part of Medicare through contributory payments in the same manner as the rest of the social security program is financed. Medical insurance is now paid for partly by the retiree and partly by the government.

Restrictions Denounced

Biemiller denounced current practices of restricting the Medicaid program for the poor as costs go up. "The remedy for uncontrolled costs," he said, "is not curtailment of the program, but establishment of reasonable and effective cost controls."

A financing mechanism for Medicaid, Biemiller continued, should provide comprehensive benefits, continuity of care, accessible services and a contractual relationship between those who pay the bills and those who furnish the care.

He commended the Administration for turning the public's attention toward the major need for reform in public welfare, but he said its recommendations are "neither adequate nor entirely appropriate."

He quoted AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's approval of Administration proposals to eliminate welfare investigations and to do away with "the man in the house" rule on aid to dependent children.

He welcomed the Administration's proposed floor for welfare benefits but said the annual level of $1,600 for a family of four is "completely inadequate."

Even adding $750 as the value of food stamps, "a family of four would still have to eke out a living at approximately 40 percent below the poverty line," Biemiller noted.

"We urge a federalized public welfare program with payments to those forced to depend on them at no less than the poverty level," he stressed.

As for an Administration measure to continue mandatory work and training programs for those on welfare, Biemiller asked:

"How can people be compelled to take jobs that aren't available to them, or take training programs that aren't functioning, or put their children in day care centers that haven't been built?"

'Reason for Being'

"We in the labor movement are not johnny-come-latelys in the fight against poverty," he said. "This has been our reason for being since the very inception of trade unions."

The labor movement long ago found out, he added, "that the most important aspect of the fight against poverty is the creation of job opportunities at adequate wages for millions of unemployed and underemployed Americans."

Job programs, with the federal government as an employer "of last resort," Biemiller made clear, are the main ingredient missing from Administration recommendations to Congress.

Pres. Nelson H. Cruikshank of the National Council of Senior Citizens also testified in support of Gilbert's bill on the grounds that it "meets today's needs with today's resources."

He congratulated the Administration for its "imaginative thinking," said the council agrees with some of its recommendations but finds that its 10 percent increase proposal is "utterly inadequate."

Cruikshank particularly praised the sweep of the changes sought by Gilbert, pointing out that the shortcomings in social security "cannot be cured by tinkering with it."

Social security has a "tremendous potential" for abolishing poverty, Cruikshank said. "It is not just an old folks program. It protects widows and children of workers who die. It protects the younger worker who is disabled and those dependent on his earnings."

What the committee and Congress does now to improve the lot of the elderly, he concluded, "will decide whether they live out their lives in dignity and security or sink further into poverty and despair."

LABOR'S DRIVE for enactment of social security increases sufficient to wipe out poverty among the elderly got underway as AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, left, testified before the House Ways & Means Committee, headed by Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), center. Biemiller was accompanied by AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman, right.

Farm Workers Shut Out Again On Jobless Pay

The House Ways & Means Committee voted to continue to exclude farm workers from unemployment insurance coverage and rejected a labor-supported proposal to set federal minimum standards on the amount of benefits.

Extension of coverage to some 400,000 workers on large farms had been recommended by the Administration, but the committee voted it down, 15-10. It rejected national benefit standards by a 15-9 vote.

The committee then gave final approval to a bill extending coverage to some 4 million additional workers, providing up to 13 weeks of additional federal benefits during periods of high unemployment, and raising the taxable wage base.

The coverage would be added primarily by including workers in small establishments now exempt, employes of nonprofit organizations, employes of state hospitals and colleges, and some 200,000 agricultural processing workers.

The Administration had asked extension of coverage to 5.6 million of the estimated 12 million workers now excluded and the AFL-CIO had urged that all workers be covered.

Extended federal benefits would be paid when a state's unemployment rate was 4 percent or higher for three consecutive months or when the national rate was 4.5 percent or higher for that period.

The committee trimmed back an Administration proposal to raise the amount of wages subject to the payroll tax on employers. The figure is now $3,000 in most states. The Administration proposed $6,000 and the committee settled for $4,200 by 1972.

ment concessions made by the United States.

That finding qualifies the workers for adjustment aid, retroactive to their layoff, of approximately $80 a week for up to 52 weeks.

Persons over 60 are entitled to an additional 13 weeks of benefits and workers in retraining programs are eligible for up to 26 additional weeks of benefits. Workers who move to another city to take a job offer also are entitled to a relocation allowance.

The formula under the law for adjustment grants is 65 percent of the worker's wage up to a maximum of 65 percent of the national average for manufacturing.

Key Provision

Protection for workers adversely affected was billed as one of the key provisions of the 1962 law when it was before Congress. But time after time, the Tariff Commission ruled that layoffs and cutbacks couldn't be pinned to imports—at least not to its satisfaction.

In a letter accompanying its petitions for adjustment allowances, the Steelworkers stressed that even in a period of high prosperity, "pockets of serious injury exist" and policies which may be good for the world's economy may nevertheless prove "disastrous for some people."

Meyer Bernstein, the USWA's international affairs director, urged the Tariff Commission to take "a new and more humane look at the problem" of job loss from imports, with emphasis on what the intent of Congress and the Administration was in enacting the 1962 legislation.

He cited as "particularly appalling" the layoffs at the U.S. Steel plant in Los Angeles, where more than half the workers came from Watts and similar areas.

Bernstein noted that the plant had opened "just in time to offer Negroes and Mexicans hope for the future. With jobs at good wages they could live like other Americans. Now their dream, and our government's solemn promise, have been shattered," he said.

The two U.S. Steel plants fabricated power transmission towers and parts and the Armco mill produced welded pipe until it shut down its operations with a letter to employes saying it could no longer compete with cheaper products from other countries.

Henning Rejoins Staff Of California AFL-CIO

San Francisco—John F. Henning, former U.S. ambassador to New Zealand and former Under Secretary of Labor in the Kennedy-Johnson administrations, has been named administrative assistant to the California AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer and director of research.

Henning had served as state AFL-CIO research director from 1949 to 1959, when he was named state industrial relations director under Gov. Edmund G. Brown. In his new post he replaces Mike Peevey, now with the University of California at Berkeley.

Desegregation Ruling Spurs AFT Session

Pres. David Selden of the Teachers has called leaders of big-city AFT locals to meet in Washington Nov. 17 in the wake of the Supreme Court's decision on school desegregation.

In many instances, Selden said, "drastic changes will be necessary to eliminate any traces of racism in student and staff assignment." The union hopes to help "develop plans for compliance with the decision," he said.

The AFT "hails the decision requiring all school districts to integrate without further delay," he said. Selden cited the union's record of active support and participation in the battle to end segregation in public facilities.

Also invited to the Nov. 17 meeting are representatives of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare and the U.S. Office of Education.

Meany Warns GE Struggle All-Out Challenge to Labor

As Debate Opens:

Haynsworth's Role Cited in Land Sales

By David L. Perlman

New evidence of disturbing conduct was added to an already massive case against Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., as the Senate debated his nomination to the Supreme Court.

It was disclosed in a Chicago Daily News story exposing land-juggling by the Carolina Vend-A-Matic Co., Haynsworth, and his fellow company directors and pension fund trustees.

On at least two occasions, the story by Washington reporter William J. Eaton reveals, Haynsworth "sold property to himself, in effect."

Earlier the case against confirmation of Haynsworth was summed up by members of the Senate Judiciary Committee who are opposing his nomination—that he does not meet the high standards that should be required for promotion to the Supreme Court.

Committee members in a series of individual reports cited repeated conflicts of interests in cases which he judged, evasions and contradictions in his testimony, and a record of reversals by the Supreme Court on major decisions.

An earlier disclosure that Haynsworth and an influential friend had both managed to take a tax deduction on the same house was considered at least a gray mark against the judge—within the letter of the law but eyebrow-raising.

The land-juggling episodes add to an overall image of the judge that, as much as anything else, has caused Republican as well as Democratic senators to announce their opposition to the appointment.

In one episode reported by the Chicago Daily News, Haynsworth invested more than $11,000 from Carolina Vend-A-Matic's pension fund—of which he was a trustee—to purchase a 90-acre farm.

As the newspaper story notes,

Senate Votes $1 Billion for Clean Water

The Senate smashed through the Administration's budget barriers and voted nearly five times the amount the President had requested to combat water pollution.

It then prepared to join the House in releasing—at least temporarily—$1 billion more in federal aid to education funds than the Administration had budgeted.

On the water pollution appropriations, the Senate insisted on the full $1 billion Congress had authorized to be spent this year when it passed the Clean Water Act in 1966.

That law authorized steadily-increased federal grants to help states and communities build sewage treatment plants. But the Administration budget asked that only $214 million be spent this year.

The House raised the figure to $600 million, and the Senate boosted it an additional $400 million.

It defeated—by an overwhelming 82-5 margin—a motion to cut the appropriation back to the amount of the budget request. Then it approved the $1 billion figure as part

A news photographer who recorded the scene found himself the target of a long-range lens as the GE crew "zeroed in" on him from its plywood box shelter mounted on a GE van behind a company fence. The pickets are among 150,000 members of 13 unions on strike at GE locations all over the country.

Jobless Rate Holds At Two-Year High

By Duane Emme

The nation's unemployment rate, which shot up to its highest level in two years in September, was virtually unchanged in October, the Labor Dept. reported.

Although the rate dipped from 4 to 3.9 percent between the two months, the Bureau of Labor Statistics termed the change insignificant. The rates in both months were higher than in any month since October 1967.

"What we are getting is a confirmation that unemployment has indeed gone up substantially," said Harold Goldstein, BLS deputy commissioner.

On the jobs side, non-farm payroll employment increased by about 190,000 in October to 70.7 million seasonally adjusted, with all but about 10,000 of the increase occurring in services and trade.

Gains in those two sectors, as well as in government, finance, insurance and real estate, managed to offset declines in manufacturing, contract construction, transportation, and public utilities.

Meanwhile, statistics released by BLS showed that employment increases have averaged 93,000 a month since June in contrast to an average monthly gain of 234,000 between October 1968 and June 1969.

BLS said "the slowdown in employment growth since June has occurred in all major industry divisions except services."

Future of Bargaining At Stake

By Eugene A. Kelly

The strike of 150,000 workers against the General Electric Co., is labor's response to a challenge that "strikes at the very heart of trade unionism," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared in letters to the leaders of 121 national and international unions.

"It is a simple fact: every union and every union member has a direct stake in the GE struggle," Meany wrote in asking for immediate donations to the GE strike relief fund set up by the AFL-CIO and for a strong turnout at strike-support rallies Nov. 17-20 in 23 major cities.

"This is more than another big strike," Meany declared in his letter. "It is a strike that involves the future of collective bargaining, not only in GE, not only in the electrical industry, but everywhere in America." He added:

"I cannot stress too strongly the gravity of the challenge posed by GE. It is a challenge that must be faced where it is being faced today—on the picket line, until GE makes a realistic, common-sense proposal to end the strike.

"The immediate need is money. The strikers need money—immediately and regularly."

As a first step, Meany urged an immediate contribution from each union to the GE Strike Relief Fund, to be sent to Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland at AFL-CIO headquarters.

GE Outfoxes Itself in Bid to Curb Pickets

Morganton, N.C.—General Electric Co. asked for an injunction against a striking local union in its current nationwide labor dispute and wound up with a restraining order against itself as well.

State Superior Court Judge Sam Ervin III enjoined GE, its employes and others "acting in concert with them" from "engaging in any acts of violence, intimidation or coercion of any pickets or the union members or any working employes. . . ."

The court order also forbids operating an auto entering or leaving the GE plant at Hickory, N.C., at more than 10 miles an hour within 50 feet of a picket line, or

National Health Insurance Termed 'Only System' for Adequate Care

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany pressed labor's drive for a national health insurance program, terming it "the only system that will provide truly adequate health care to all Americans."

The American people deserve "the best health care in the world," but they're not getting it, Meany told a conference sponsored by the federation's Industrial Union Dept. on "The Crisis in Health Care." More than 350 representatives of IUD-affiliated unions were on hand.

The $60 billion a year spent for health care in the United States is a larger percentage of the nation's gross national product than is spent by any other country in the world, Meany noted.

But by all measurements of infant mortality and life expectancy, the United States is falling further and further behind. "Our record is getting worse instead of better," he said.

IUD Pres. I. W. Abel, in an opening address, expanded on the theme of the two-day meeting "dedicated to the concept that quality health care is a birthright of every American."

Meany charged that medical care costs have escalated far above other increases in living costs because of an inefficient "cost-plus" method of setting hospital charges and blatant "profiteering" by doctors.

Unions that have tried to meet the health care needs of their members at the bargaining table too often have found themselves on a treadmill, Meany noted.

"Just as fast as we could negotiate money to provide more and better health services for our members," he said, "the doctors raised

Engineers Ask Curbs Against Air Hijacking

Mexico City—The Flight Engineers renewed a call for an international agreement to curb airliner hijackings.

The 60 delegates to the FEIA's 21st annual convention urged the Administration to establish bilateral agreements with all nations that would provide for mandatory extradition of hijackers followed by trials and punishment for those convicted.

Hijacking of any commercial airliner greatly endangers the lives of the passengers and crews as well, the Flight Engineers noted, and results in delays and inconvenience for the victims.

Delegates also called for an expanded organizing campaign to win representation for maintenance foremen and ground engineers at Pan American Airways.

FEIA Pres. William A. Gill, Jr., was re-elected to another two year term. Elected new vice presidents were Donald Thielke and Errol Johnstead. Executive Vice Pres. and Sec.-Treas. Harry S. O'Brien was not up for election.

Speakers included former Labor Sec. Willard Wirtz, who reviewed the nation's progress in the 1960s and alerted the delegates to the needs and expectations of the '70s.

The union selected Hawaii as the site for the 22nd convention next year.

Wilbur Daniels Elected An ILG Vice President

Wilbur Daniels has been elected a vice president and general executive board member of the Ladies' Garment Workers. He will continue as director of the union's master agreements department.

Daniels first joined the ILGWU in 1943 as a member of the union's research department. He later served as associate general counsel of the union.

He was assistant to the president of the ILGWU from 1959 to 1961 before he left for a period in private law practice. He returned to the union staff in 1965 to head the master agreements department.

National Airlines Faces British Unions' Boycott

London—Union-busting airlines are "mighty unwelcome at British airports," officials of British transport unions have assured Machinists locked out 10 months ago by National Airlines.

National plans to fly a jetliner to London Jan. 1, it has announced in a flurry of printers' ink. When word of the line's plans got to Europe, union officers assured IAM Airline Coordinator Frank Heisler that the flight is unlikely to have passengers on board for the return trip.

Sec. M. S. Hoda of the civil aviation section of the International Transport Workers Federation, with which IAM is affiliated, sent an all-union alert from ITF headquarters here. Among the responses was one from Mark Young, secretary for the unions in Britain's National Joint Council for Civil Air Transport.

"The trade unions of the National Joint Council have asked me to tell you," Young wrote Heisler, they "are prepared to give every possible assistance in your dispute with National Airlines. If you could advise me of any aircraft of National which may be flying to Britain, we will take steps to see that it is 'blacked' on arrival."

"Blacked" on this side of the water means not handled, serviced or cleared for departure—in other words, boycotted.

Earlier Clive Jenkins, secretary of Britain's Association of Scientific, Technical and Managerial Staffs gave IAM members picketing National at Miami Beach this reaction:

"British workers have an intense dislike of mischievous anti-union activities by arrogant employers. If National plans to establish facilities at London, its management should mark this well: union-busting airlines are mighty unwelcome."

Jenkins' statement was well publicized. The London Daily Mirror, circulation 17 million, carried a photo of Jenkins picketing with IAM members in Florida.

The airline was ordered by the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in September to reinstate more than 1,000 IAM members it locked out and fired last January in violation of the Railway Labor Act. The lockout came after National suspended three mechanics for refusing to move planes from terminal to hangar with two-man crews, as management unilaterally decreed, and 1,000 other ground crewmen staged a protest walkout.

National planes are still flying despite the lockout and the court order.

Unions Score Build-Up Of Airline Strike Pact

Six AFL-CIO unions have expressed vehement opposition to further strengthening of a mutual strike aid pact between eight major U.S. airlines and announced they would so testify before the Civil Aeronautics Board.

Trunkline carriers first agreed in 1958 to come to the aid of struck airlines participating in the mutual aid plan. Later they agreed to share up to 25 percent of normal operating expenses of a struck line. Recently they asked CAB to approve payments totaling 50 percent of normal expenses for the first two weeks of a strike, then 45, 40 and 35 percent after succeeding weeks.

The pact signers advised CAB that the 25 percent figure is not sufficient to preserve the financial health of a struck carrier. They said more money is needed "to strengthen the ability of carriers to resist union demands for excessive and inflationary settlements."

The supplemental payments were criticized by the AFL-CIO unions in the air transport industry. They will voice their objections again when CAB reviews a recommendation by an examiner that the pact should be extended.

The unions involved are the Machinists, Transport Workers, Railway, Airline & Steamship Clerks, Air Line Dispatchers, Flight Engineers and Air Line Pilots.

An IAM spokesman said the unions have "repeatedly told the board that the plan is disruptive of good labor-management relations. It encourages disputes and discourages bargaining" as envisioned by the law regulating air carriers.

Illinois Outreach Program Renewed

East St. Louis, Ill.—The Labor Dept. has renewed an Apprenticeship Outreach contract with the Business Representatives of Southern Illinois to prepare 30 minority youths for the construction trades.

The $45,000 contract calls for up to 10 weeks of recruiting, tutoring and placing the 30 youths who otherwise might not pass entrance examinations for building trades apprenticeships.

In its previous contract, the council placed 58 apprentices—15 as carpenters, eight sheet metal workers, eight electricians, eight plumbers-pipefitters, five iron workers, four operating engineers, four painters, two bricklayers, two roofers, one asbestos worker and one cement mason.

Conservative Upset In Wisconsin Race

Jefferson, Wis.—A liberal Democrat upset a prominent right-wing Republican in a special election for a Wisconsin state Senate seat that had been considered safely Republican.

Democrat Dale McKenna defeated David Keene, national president of the conservative Young Americans for Freedom. Keene ran on a "cut-the-budget" platform, attacking funds for welfare programs and aid to the cities.

The Madison, Wis., Capital Times termed the Democratic victory in a normally conservative district "a major political upset."

Most Industries Affected:

Jobless Rate Holds At Two-Year High

Figures showed that employment actually has decreased on a monthly average since June in three categories—contract construction, manufacturing and federal employment.

The decline in construction jobs has averaged 15,000 per month over the past five months, manufacturing has dropped by an average of 2,000 per month and federal government is down by about 12,000 per month.

The number of unemployed persons was 2.8 million in October, about 125,000 fewer than in September. But after seasonal adjustments, unemployment was unchanged.

Over the year, unemployment was up by 325,000, BLS said, with the increase about equally distributed among adult men, adult women and teenagers.

Jobless rates for adult men (2.4 percent), married men (1.7 percent), adult women (4.2 percent) and teenagers (13 percent) were essentially unchanged from September.

The unemployment rate for full-time workers edged down two-tenths of 1 percent to 3.2 percent in October, while the rate for part-time workers was unchanged at 6.9 percent, BLS reported.

For both Negro and white workers, jobless rates showed no change between September and October. The Negro rate was 6.9 percent while the white rate held at 3.5 percent.

The "most significant" point in looking at unemployment, Goldstein said, is to note that the overall job rate and rates for individual groups "have moved well above the low levels reached last winter."

Substantial drops in the average workweek and average earnings in October also were looked upon by Goldstein as evidence of the slowdown in the economy.

The seasonally adjusted average workweek for rank-and-file workers dropped by three-tenths of an hour to 37.5 hours after seven straight months without change.

In manufacturing, the average workweek fell three-tenths of an hour to 40.5 hours seasonally adjusted. The decline ran through nearly all major industries "and was particularly sharp in the durable goods sector," BLS pointed out.

Overtime hours in manufacturing dropped by two-tenths of an hour to 3.4 hours a week. With the exception of April 1968, when hours were affected by civil disturbances, factory overtime was at its lowest level in nearly 2 years.

Average hourly earnings for rank and file workers rose by one cent to $3.11 in October. However, due to the decline in the workweek, average weekly earnings fell by 86 cents to $116.94. The drop in weekly earnings ran through construction, manufacturing and trade. Finance, insurance and real estate were the only categories to show an increase in weekly earnings.

GE Outfoxes Itself in Bid to Curb Pickets

"destroying or damaging any property" of employes, pickets or unions.

GE first got an injunction without a hearing, limiting picketing at Hickory. But union attorneys were later granted a hearing and argued that where there is company misconduct, an injunction should not be a one-sided affair.

GE lawyers did not contest the court's subsequent order, which banned not only dangerous driving by management personnel but forbade interference with plant driveways. The court, however, did not limit the number of pickets who could be present on the side of the road opposite the exit driveway.

Machinists Call Security Top Goal in Aerospace

Los Angeles—Union security and job security will be top-priority goals in 1970 and 1971 negotiations with major aerospace manufacturers in the U.S. and Canada, delegates from Machinist locals representing nearly 400,000 workers decided here.

At four days of meetings, delegates to the 16th IAM Aerospace Conference reported that besides being subject to numerous layoffs, the industry is the only major one in North America "in which union security is the exception and not the rule."

They directed all negotiators to stress the importance of a union shop in all aerospace contracts. And they called on union members to oppose any ceiling on wage clauses keyed to the cost of living.

The conference endorsed government continuation of the Apollo space exploration program and additional federal funds for the supersonic transport plane.

The conference urged all IAM members to ask their congressmen and senators to approve funds for SST prototypes as "an investment in continued world leadership for American aviation and America's future prosperity."

A policy statement said "America's stake in the development of an SST is enormous. More than 50,000 jobs would be provided" not only at two major firms but also at factories of subcontractors and suppliers in 43 states.

The overseas market for SSTs during the next 20 years is estimated at more than $25 billion, the conferees said.

One aerospace contract has expired this year, and IAM members are on strike at Evendale, O., where General Electric Co. has government contracts for jet engines. The strikers there, and at other GE plants employing 150,000 union members, are being strongly supported by all segments of the U.S. labor movement.

Major contracts are due for renegotiation next year at Fairchild-Hiller, Cessna, General Dynamics and Canadair, Boeing, Lockheed and other major firms have pacts expiring in 1971.

IAM Vice Presidents Charles F. West and Robert R. Simpson were conference co-chairmen. IAM Pres. Floyd Smith addressed the closing banquet session and Sec.-Treas. Eugene Glover told delegates why the IAM strike fund needs strengthening. Many past gains have been won with the backing of a strike fund, he said.

Fund Drive Pressed:

GE Struggle Called Test for All Unions

after 13 coordinated unions rejected GE's one and only contract offer, started the strike relief fund with a $50,000 donation. Then the council set an initial goal of a $1 contribution from each AFL-CIO union member.

In other strike developments:

- The unions allied with the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee reported no change in GE's take-it-or-leave-it stance at meetings arranged by the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service in New York City.
- Committee members met also with Westinghouse Electric Corp., and other meetings were scheduled for Nov. 19 and 20 in Pittsburgh.

No New Offer

At the first meeting, union representatives reported no change in Westinghouse's proposals since Nov. 9, when the corporation made one change in its previous offer echoing that of GE.

On GE picket lines across the nation, strikers' spirits were reported high and solidarity strengthened as more contracts expired and more pickets reported for a tour of duty.

"By the end of November," one CBC official predicted, "fewer than 1,000 union members will be working in a GE plant." Nearly all union contracts will have expired by that date.

Meany and Kirkland head a list of trade union leaders scheduled to speak at GE strike rallies the week of Nov. 17. Kirkland speaks in San Francisco Nov. 17 and Seattle Nov. 19. Meany will address the New York City rally Nov. 20. (Rally schedule this page.)

Meany, in his letter to AFL-CIO union leaders, warned that if GE should prevail, if the strikers are forced to submit to the company's terms, "every union would feel the impact."

Court Agreed

"This is not an exaggeration," he declared. "The same conclusions were reached by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit in a case that arose from 1960 negotiations.

"The court ruled that GE's method of dealing with unions, commonly known as Boulwarism" after Lemuel Boulware, former GE official who developed it, "is not bargaining at all, and consequently is illegal."

But the court went further, Meany said, quoting the key passage:

"Indeed, such conduct amounts to a declaration on the part of the company that not only the union, but the process of collective bargaining itself may be dispensed with."

In other words, Meany noted, "GE wants to reduce unions to the status of administrative tools, like the so-called unions in totalitarian countries—allowed to exist but not to function."

GE "has pursued this illegal policy for 20 years. It has gotten away with it because no single union was strong enough to force a change," the federation leader said.

He recalled that three years ago, for the first time, the unions coordinated their efforts through an AFL-CIO committee. The combined unions "did force GE to alter its one-and-only offer enough to be acceptable. But the company came back this year with even greater rigidity to its one-offer technique," he said.

Danger of Imitators

Meany emphasized that GE's example "has already been imitated by other companies in the electrical industry. Unless this strike succeeds, other powerful companies will try the same tactic."

GE, the nation's fourth largest corporation, is appealing the decision that outlawed its one-offer system.

Administration leaders have asserted there will be no government intervention in the strike.

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, which is paying out more than $1 million in benefits a week to strikers at GE and several smaller firms, called a special convention of its 625 locals at the Americana Hotel in New York City Nov. 21 to review its strike relief system.

The other AFL-CIO unions on strike are the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Machinists, Steelworkers, Technical Engineers, Carpenters, Plumbers, Allied Industrial Workers, Sheet Metal Workers and Flint Glass Workers. Also coordinating their strike activities are the unaffiliated Teamsters, Auto Workers and United Electrical Workers.

INTERUNION SOLIDARITY on a General Electric Co. picket line is displayed by striking members of three unions at GE's Medical Systems Dept., at West Milwaukee, Wis. The pickets are from Machinists Lodge 78, Steam Fitters Local 601 and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 663. The plant normally employs about 1,000 workers.

Farm Workers Offer Backing To GE Strikers

Delano, Calif.—The United Farm Workers Organizing Committee adopted a resolution giving full support to the strikers at all General Electric plants. Dolores Huerta, a UFWOC vice president, issued the following statement:

"Many people may ask what our fledgling union can do to help in a strike as massive as this one with GE. It is true that we cannot give financial help but we have a boycott going which involves hundreds of thousands of people.

"We intend to ask all of these people to join the GE strike in their local communities, picketing with them wherever and whenever such support is asked.

"The labor movement in general has told the growers in the agricultural industry that it will not allow farm workers to be pushed around as they are building their union. Now it is our chance to show our appreciation by volunteering the only things we have—picket signs, feet used to walking, and trade union spirit—to show GE that they can't get by destroying their workers' unions."

Cesar Chavez, UFWOC director, is on a national tour of boycott centers. He announced in Chicago that he regards the GE strike as equal in importance to the effort to increase support for the boycott.

Top Union Leaders Set As GE Rally Speakers

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland head the list of trade union leaders who will address General Electric strike rallies next week in 23 cities across the country.

The complete schedule is listed below:

Monday, Nov. 17:

Atlanta, James A. Suffridge, president emeritus, Retail Clerks, 7:30 p.m., Electric Plaza Auditorium.

Los Angeles, Louis Stulberg, president, Ladies' Garment Workers, 8 p.m., Roosevelt Hall.

San Francisco, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, 7 p.m., Del Webb Town House.

Oakland, Calif., William L. Kircher, AFL-CIO director of organization, 8:00 p.m., Labor Temple.

Tuesday, Nov. 18.

Louisville, Paul Jennings, president, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, 7:30 p.m., Seelbach Hotel.

Chicago, Joseph D. Keenan, secretary, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, 8 p.m., Musicians Hall.

Philadelphia, Matthew Guinan, president, Transport Workers; 8 p.m., Sheraton Hotel.

St. Louis, Jerry Wurf, president, State, County & Municipal Employes, 8 p.m., Carpenters Hall No. 1.

Wednesday, Nov. 19:

Birmingham, Max Greenberg, president, Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, 7:30 p.m., USWA Local 1013 Hall, Fairfield, Ala.

Boston, Thomas W. Gleason, president, Longshoremen, 8 p.m., Hotel Bradford.

Cleveland, I. W. Abel, president, Steelworkers, 7:30 p.m., Manger Hotel.

Detroit, Jerry Wurf; 7:30 p.m., Retail Clerks Local 876.

Kansas City, John H. Lyons, president, Iron Workers, time and place to be announced.

Memphis, S. Frank Raftery, president, Painters, 7:30 p.m., Rubber Workers Hall.

Milwaukee, Matthew Guinan, 7:30 p.m., Local 19806.

Minneapolis-St. Paul, C. L. Dennis, president, Railway Clerks, 8 p.m., Palm Ballroom.

Seattle, Lane Kirkland, 8 p.m., Labor Temple.

Portland, Ore., William L. Kircher; 7:30 p.m., Portland Labor Center.

Thursday, Nov. 20:

Baltimore, Floyd E. Smith, president, Machinists 8 p.m., Clerks Hall.

Houston, A. F. Grospiron, president, Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers, 8 p.m., AFL-CIO Bldg.

New Orleans, Max Greenberg; 8 p.m., Seafarers Hall.

New York, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, 6 p.m., Roosevelt Auditorium.

Pittsburgh, Thomas W. Gleason; 7:30 p.m., William Penn Hotel.

Construction Panel Gets Staff Chief

James L. Macpherson, a regional director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, will head the Washington staff of the newly-established Construction Industry Collective Bargaining Commission.

Labor Sec. George P. Shultz said Macpherson will take a leave of absence to serve as executive director of the commission, set up by the Administration in September to "develop voluntary procedures" for construction problem-solving. Macpherson taught economics at the University of Montana and held various federal posts before becoming Cleveland regional director for the mediation service in 1960.

Shultz is chairman of the commission. Labor representatives on the 12-member body are Pres. M. A. Hutcheson of the Carpenters, Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, Pres. Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers—all AFL-CIO vice presidents—and Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the federation's Building & Construction Trades Dept.

PICKETING PRESIDENT is Paul Jennings, front, of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. Between meetings Jennings joined members of IUE Local 623 at the General Electric Co., appliance and repair shop at West Mifflin, Pa., near Pittsburgh. The IUE is one of 13 unions which coordinated their bargaining with GE and struck after rejecting the company's one flat "take-it-or-leave-it" offer.

Service Employes Wins Louisville School Vote

Louisville, Ky.—Custodial workers employed by the Louisville Board of Education voted by more than seven-to-one for the Service Employes in an election conducted by the board.

Out of 400 eligible voters in the unit, the balloting was as follows: 297 for SEIU Local 557, 36 for no union, 10 votes challenged and seven votes declared void.

Wisconsin Vote Stops Dirksen Amendment

Madison, Wis. — The head of Wisconsin's One-Man, One-Vote Committee has credited the State AFL-CIO with a key role in persuading the legislature to reject a resolution calling for a constitutional convention to overturn the Supreme Court's ruling that legislative districts must be equal in population.

The state Assembly voted down the so-called Dirksen Amendment resolution by a 62-36 vote.

Mrs. John Toussaint, chairman of the statewide coalition against the amendment and president of the Wisconsin League of Women Voters, said in a statement:

"While a number of organizations and individuals joined with us in opposing the Dirksen Amendment, the influence, organizational ability and legislative knowledge of the State AFL-CIO was undoubtedly a key factor in the success of our campaign."

At one time or another, 33 legislatures passed constitutional amendment resolutions but the validity of several has been challenged.

Thirty-four states must act in order to summon a convention—a method of initiating a constitutional amendment which has never been used in the nation's history.

The late Sen. Everett M. Dirksen (R-Ill.) led the drive to force a constitutional convention after the Senate repeatedly refused to act on his proposed amendment.

The GE Line

THE GE LINE—called "Boulwarism" after its originator, Lemuel R. Boulware, the former head of the company's employe relations—is designed to weaken and even destroy the union. It is not simply that the company makes one offer and the "bargaining" consists in the workers deciding to agree. That, of course, makes a mockery of the whole idea of negotiating.

But beyond that, GE has always tried to bypass the union, to set up its own line of communications with the rank and file, and to pit groups of workers against one another by handing out special benefits to some. And all this is done with a pious rhetoric about the company's responsibility to the community.

The essence of Boulwarism is a patronizing attitude toward the workers. The kindly, omnipotent corporation decides out of its infinite wisdom what is really good for the employes who then get the opportunity to ratify the choices made on high. Given the fact that some GE executives of that era admittedly conspired to fix prices and in the process the company overcharged public utilities one should, I think, have the right to question GE's judgment.

But more basically, the GE approach is one which could lead to bitter strikes.

From the epic 116-day steel strike of 1959 down to this dispute at GE, the issues which make the rank and file most intransigent are those involving whether they are treated as human beings or as cogs in a machine. GE's policy is not simply a refusal to bargain collectively as the law requires. It is also a way of provoking a fight.

HOWEVER, THIS CONFLICT is not just a result of Boulwarism, for it also raises the question of inflation and that is going to be part and parcel of all negotiations in the near future.

In the early years of the current boom, there was still considerable unemployment in the United States. Under those circumstances, the companies were in a stronger position than the unions and they were able to hold wages down even while production rose.

That is why during the first half of the decade, unit labor costs did not increase at all. As a result, business profits rose much more than workers' pay. Between 1960 and 1965, after-tax profits were up 52 percent, dividends 43 percent and the factory workers received only 21 percent more.

It was small wonder that, when the labor market tightened up and the unions achieved a better bargaining position, they demanded their share of a boom which had been generated by the government, presumably in the interest of all. The inflationary initiative, in short, came from business, not the unions.

I do not recite this history to make an academic point but to suggest solutions. First of all, war and defense spending generally are, among their other tragic aspects, inflationary since they pay people but do not provide goods and services on the domestic market. That is one more reason why, when the Viet Nam horror ends, it is so crucial to reduce military spending and replace it with social investments which will use the wasted potential of the unemployed and the underemployed in producing things we need.

And secondly the companies cannot, like GE and the rest, take all the advantages of a boom in high profits and then expect the unions to be ascetics in the name of fighting inflation. If there were rational wage and profit controls that kind of injustice would never happen. And that is precisely what we need now.

Finally, all this goes to show that the American corporations, for all their sophisticated talk about social responsibility, are still capable of old-fashioned anti-unionism and profit grabbing.

Under Two Flags?

A Word Edgewise:

White House Policy Must Apply To Vice President's Views, Too

By John P. Roche

THE RECENT FLURRY about Vice Pres. Spiro Agnew's gift for flamboyant phrases raises a number of interesting questions. The first relates to the actual content of his speeches, to what he defended as his right to employ "punchy language."

Here I admit I am puzzled: if the Vice President thinks that calling anti-war demonstrators "an effete corps of impudent snobs" is the use of "punchy language," where did he pick up his vocabulary? (For real punch, I would recommend, say, "nervous Nellies.") Is there anybody in American politics—except perhaps an effete corps of impudent snobs (if one does somewhere exist)—who would even realize he had been punched by that effete formulation?

However, putting that interesting question aside, it seems fair to say that Agnew's observations about the character of his opponents hardly merit his impeachment. By any historical standards our political rhetoric is colorful, and invariably whoever is on the receiving end hollers "foul."

When Harry Truman suggested that Sen. Joe McCarthy was the Kremlin's most useful American, we liberals cheered him on. When Pres. John Kennedy quoted his father on the canine ancestry of big businessmen, we chuckled and said, "boys will be boys." In other words, indignation in such matters is usually a function of whose dog is getting beaten.

Finally, if we want to rate the Vice President on effectiveness, it will be conceded at once that he has a long way to go before he approximates the 1954 record, established by his present boss. In that year, Richard Nixon really played tough—and the GOP still lost the congressional elections.

But, conceding First Amendment rights to the Vice President, there is a more fundamental question implicit in this whole brouhaha. To what extent is it legitimate for the Vice President of the United States to go in business for himself? When asked, Pres. Nixon observed that he had not censored the Veep and he believed Agnew to be a fine man whose views are always interesting.

This is really quite nice and brought initial appreciation from the press. (Journalists considered Pres. Johnson's strenuous efforts to keep his troops in line as a conspiracy against the people.) Similarly, there has been much applause for the principle, set forth by Nixon, that his will be an "open Administration." Then Agnew started to swing and the press began to have second thoughts.

While I yield to no one in my dedication to freedom of speech, there is another issue at stake in this controversy, one that has been universally ignored. It is the small matter of responsibility. If, for example, the President comes out for immediate desegregation, for taxing municipal bonds, for population control, and one-man, one-vote, and the Vice President publicly takes the opposite viewpoint, who the hell is running the store?

The examples I have used are semi-hypothetical, but let us take a real one: in 1967-68 Vice President Humphrey was under enormous liberal pressure to "speak out against Viet Nam."

IN EFFECT, he was urged to repudiate the President's policy. He refused, not because he was afraid of Johnson, but because he believed in responsibility, and felt (correctly in my judgment) that his differences on Viet Nam were tactical rather than fundamental. Had he not accepted the Administration's strategy, his option was to resign, as did John C. Calhoun over a century ago.

In other words, the President and Vice President must be on the same wave length if the presidential system is to work. There can be no presidential policies for the North and East, and vice presidential policies for the South and West, any more than you can have a pacifist for Secretary of State and a militarist for Secretary of Defense.

The President is elected to make policy and accept responsibility for it, not to chair a debating society. The buck still stops in the Oval office.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Meany Issues Appeal:

Coordinated Financial Support Immediate Need in GE Strike

This is the text of a letter from Pres. George Meany sent to the presidents of all AFL-CIO affiliated unions on Nov. 5 urging financial support for the General Electric strikers.

THIS IS AN URGENT APPEAL for complete cooperation and financial assistance for the GE strikers from your union and its members.

You are, of course, aware of this nationwide strike against General Electric Co., the nation's fourth largest corporate enterprise, and of the fact that the unions are united in this fight. Ten of the unions make up the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee, of which I am chairman, and their solidarity is complete.

The strikers need money immediately and regularly. The AFL-CIO Executive Council has pledged all-out support to the strike and set up a special three-member committee to handle fund-raising. The committee members are: Vice Presidents I. W. Abel, Joseph D. Keenan and Thomas W. Gleason.

As a first step, therefore, I urge an immediate contribution from your union to the GE Strike Relief Fund sent here to Secretary-Treasurer Kirkland.

In addition, the committee has set an initial goal of $1 from each AFL-CIO union member. Meeting this goal swiftly—and time is very important—requires your full participation.

Each union must decide for itself how it can best reach this goal—either from local union treasuries, or from individual members through plant-gate collections and the like, or both.

The method is immaterial. What is important is that the response be immediate and generous—for this strike is different.

This is more than another big strike. It is a strike that involves the future of collective bargaining, not only in General Electric, not only in the electrical industry, but everywhere in America.

If General Electric should prevail, if the strikers should be forced to submit to the company's terms, every union would feel the impact.

This is not an exaggeration. The same conclusions were reached last week by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit in a case that arose from the 1960 negotiations. The court ruled that GE's method of dealing with unions, commonly known as "Boulwarism," is not bargaining at all, and consequently is illegal. But the court went further; here is the key passage:

"Indeed, such conduct amounts to a declaration on the part of the company that not only the union, but the process of collective bargaining itself may be dispensed with."

In other words, GE wants to reduce unions to the status of administrative tools, like the so-called unions in totalitarian countries—allowed to exist but not to function.

GE has pursued this illegal policy for 20 years. It has gotten away with it because no single union was strong enough to force a change. Three years ago, for the first time, the unions coordinated their efforts through an AFL-CIO committee. They did force GE to alter its "one and only" offer enough to be acceptable. But the company came back this year with even greater rigidity to its one-offer technique.

GE'S EXAMPLE has already been imitated by other companies in the electrical industry. Unless this strike succeeds, other powerful companies will try the same tactics.

It is a simple fact: every union and every union member has a direct stake in the GE struggle.

The strikers bear the brunt of the fight. They need money, of course, but they need the active support of your local unions and the help of your staff representatives in many areas. Our AFL-CIO regional staff, and the state and city central bodies, are giving top priority to this effort. We hope you will help us to fill extra manpower needs as they develop.

Pres. Nixon has said there will be no government intervention. We expect him to stand by that promise.

I cannot stress too strongly the gravity of the challenge posed by GE—a challenge that strikes at the very heart of trade unionism. It is a challenge that must be faced where it is being faced today—on the picket line, until GE makes a realistic, common-sense proposal to end the strike.

The immediate need is money. So we are looking forward to the early receipt of your check to the GE Strike Relief Fund.

Border Plants Hit:

International Agreement Urged To Curb Export of U.S. Jobs

A MULTI-NATION AGREEMENT was urged by an official of the Clothing Workers to curb the export of jobs and import of products that adversely affect both U.S. workers and industries.

Soft goods, ceramics, plate glass and steel are among the industries hard hit by U.S.-owned plants along the Mexican border and "in other low-wage countries, particularly in the Far East," said Howard D. Samuel, vice president of the ACWA. Samuel appeared on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO-produced public affairs interview broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

He said that some 200 such plants have been built just south of the Mexican border in the last few years, where wages range as low as 30 cents an hour for the 20,000 workers they employ. He said that in addition to substandard wages, tax breaks granted by the Mexican government and U.S. "tariff benefits" encourage manufacturers to set up foreign assembly plants.

"Now 'assembly' is a fairly broad word," Samuel stressed, pointing out that it includes "putting together all the components of a television set or a radio . . . or most of the operations in making a shirt, or suit, or a ladies' garment."

But, he noted, Mexican consumers get no "benefit out of the manufacturing operations that are being set up there," for "even when things are made within its borders (by U.S. companies), they have to be shipped out."

Samuel said that U.S. textile and apparel imports are "growing 70 percent a year" in general, and as much as 400 percent to 500 percent on some items, but that American consumers gain no advantage in either quality or price. He pointed out that "garments coming from European countries, where the wage levels are considerably lower than wage levels in the United States, are sold for the same or higher prices than American-made garments of the same quality."

"The beneficiary is not the consumer, it is the retailer," he declared, and the retailer "is doing very well, indeed."

Imports have taken a heavy toll in jobs. Samuel said that "in the last four to five years we have lost probably 200,000 jobs" in the textiles and apparel industries—"largely due to the import factor."

RUNAWAY COMPANIES add to the plight of the worker by closing a plant in the United States and opening it across the border or overseas, Samuel said.

"I consider this a very crude form of export of jobs," he stressed.

The apparel and textile industries in the country employ about 2.5 million people—many are women and many are members of minority groups. Samuel said that any decline of employment in the industries will affect people who don't have access to other industries and who exist on the fringe of poverty.

He said the nation has spent a great deal of money in poverty programs and manpower training "to make sure that these people—women and members of minority groups—become a part of the labor market." But he warned that "if we continue to allow major imports in these areas it is going to have just the opposite effect."

Samuel was questioned by Lloyd Schwartz of Fairchild Publications and Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press.

By Press Associates, Inc.

CONTRARY TO POPULAR OPINION we are not sitting idly by while the air which we breathe becomes increasingly defiled.

Steps are being taken to combat polluted air but the effort, in relation to the problem, is so feeble that it merely seems that we are doing nothing.

Programs are now in effect on federal, state and local levels but time and the tide of pollutants have fouled our atmosphere to such a point that the problem is literally out of control.

The U.S. Public Health Service measures the severity of pollution on the basis of eight factors, chief among which are automobile and industrial waste.

According to the latest data (1967) from the Public Health Service, large, urban centers are hardest hit by air pollution—New York, Chicago, Los Angeles, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Newark and Detroit.

Washington, D.C., which has comparatively little industry, however, is among the cities in the high-pollution category. This, inevitably, points a finger at emissions of hydro-carbons, carbon monoxide and other oxides from internal combustion engines.

Our inability to bring these emissions under control provides us with some deeper insight into just why and how we are losing the fight for clean air.

A strong, positive step was taken in the 90th Congress with the passage of the Air Quality Act of 1967. A sum of $428 million for air pollution control was authorized—far less than appropriated.

In fiscal 1968 Congress authorized $74 million for regular pollution control and an additional $35 million for research and development on car fumes. The National Air Pollution Control Administration was appropriated only $64 million.

The total authorized in 1969 was $185 million but only $88 million was provided.

However, in fiscal 1970—with the section on research having expired—only $134 million was authorized and Congress has not even acted on this.

Under the law, auto makers must provide their new cars with fume control equipment. This law has been in effect for two years but since there are many old cars on the road the full impact of this might not be felt for eight to ten years. Another problem is that few states are inspecting this equipment so that its effectiveness since leaving the factory can be left open to question.

AND JUST HOW the manufacturers have complied with the law is a heated, controversial point.

In the belief that there has been foot dragging, the Justice Dept. during the Johnson Administration filed a suit charging that General Motors, Ford, Chrysler, American Motors and the Auto Manufacturers Association conspired to delay development and installation of anti-pollution equipment on cars.

Last September the Nixon Administration took a reverse tack. It suggested that the government and the auto manufacturers enter into an out-of-court consent decree whereby the manufacturers would agree to cease their foot-dragging on pollution.

Strong opposition to the consent decree arose. Los Angeles and New York sought to intervene in the case. Chicago asked $3 billion in a taxpayers' suit. Forty-six members of Congress filed a suit in Los Angeles calling for a public trial. Organized labor strongly opposed the consent decree.

Judge Jesse W. Curtis of the U.S. District Court in Los Angeles, however, has now ruled in favor of the consent decree.

For 18 months a grand jury has been compiling evidence of what the manufacturers have done and not done. Judge Curtis said, on approving the consent decree, that the transcript of the probe would be available "to all persons by subpoena or other appropriate means" if needed in further litigation against the industry.

Even with this proviso, however, the polluted cities must now start from scratch for any legal action.

This is just one example of why controlling pollution appears to be so insurmountable.

MULTI-NATIONAL AGREEMENTS are the key to curbing the export of jobs and import of products hurting both U.S. workers and industries, Clothing Workers Vice Pres. Howard D. Samuel, center, declared on Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Broadcasting System. Questioning Samuel were Lloyd Schwartz, left, of the Fairchild Publications and Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press.

THOUSANDS OF MEMPHIS CITIZENS, led by Jerry Wurf, center, president of the State, County & Municipal Employes, the Rev. Ralph D. Abernathy, right, chairman of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and Jesse Epps, Wurf's assistant, march in emphatic support of the union's organizing campaign at St. Joseph Hospital. SCLC and the union have joined hands in what Rev. Abernathy termed "a continuation of the struggle that brought Dr. Martin Luther King here a year and a half ago" in support of SCME sanitation workers. The union now has more than 7,000 members in Memphis who are employed by the city and several hospitals.

State Laws Termed Dismal Failure:

Federal Standards Pushed On Job Injury Compensation

Strong federal standards for workmen's compensation are essential if workers are to be adequately protected against job injuries, an AFL-CIO staff expert stressed in a business publication.

State laws are "dismal failures" in providing protection and the states have "simply refused" to make needed improvements, James R. O'Brien, an assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, pointed out.

O'Brien expressed labor's view in one of a series of articles in Environmental Control Management, a monthly magazine of the A. M. Best Co.

The magazine also contained an interview with Labor Sec. George P. Shultz in which he discussed shortcomings in workmen's compensation programs and needed remedies.

"The maximum weekly benefit available under a majority of state compensation laws will not permit an injured worker to maintain his family at a poverty level of subsistence," O'Brien said.

Twenty states refuse to pay benefits for the duration of a permanent disability, he emphasized, even though "every responsible organization" has long recommended that this be done.

He cited such other deficiencies as these:

- Coverage is "still inadequate in most states" with approximately 18 million workers denied workmen's compensation protection.
- Many laws allow employers to reject workmen's compensation coverage.
- Occupational disease coverage is limited by many states and where diseases are covered "victims are hampered by inadequate time limits in trying to establish claims."
- Medical benefits are restricted by time or monetary benefits and in many cases injured workers "are denied the right to select their own doctors."
- Widows and surviving dependent children are not adequately protected under many state laws.

"The states are simply ignoring these problems," O'Brien asserted.

State legislators have failed to act, he added, despite repeated urgings from the Council of State Governments, administrators of state laws, the U.S. Dept. of Labor and the AFL-CIO.

The AFL-CIO has long been on record in favor of a federal workmen's compensation system, O'Brien observed. But this is a long-range objective, and the immediate goal is to secure federal standards.

The magazine did not question Shultz as to the need for federal standards, but confined the interview to what it described as "problem areas" in workmen's compensation.

However, Shultz advocated standards that states ought to meet, including permanent and total disability benefits equal to two-thirds of the worker's wage and a continuance of benefits during the period of disability.

In other areas, Shultz called for more adequate medical benefits; free choice of doctor; laws that include all employers; coverage of all hazards, types of injuries and diseases and administration of statutes with "a sympathetic understanding of their intent."

Other contributors to the magazine's discussion of "workmen's compensation in upheaval" were Paul S. Wise, president, American Mutual Insurance Alliance; Alfred J. Napier, chief judge, New Jersey Division of Workmen's Compensation; and Harry W. Dahl, head of Iowa's Compensation Service.

Wise, while opposing federal standards, cited many deficiencies in state laws, including a number of those pointed out by O'Brien. He conceded that federal interest in workmen's compensation "will wax rather than wane in the future."

Napier predicted that the day may come when social security takes over workmen's compensation, leaving only the determination of benefits for permanent disability and dependency to be ascertained by some type of forum or court.

Dahl expressed the view that "upon the insistence of leaders from industry, labor and the public" states will pass laws to improve workmen's compensation programs.

But he added that state administrators of workmen's compensation would favor a national commission to recommend standards and federal legislation if the states don't meet these recommendations.

West Virginia Delegates Expand Political Effort

Charleston, W.Va.—The West Virginia AFL-CIO set its sights on electing a more liberal state legislature in 1970 and gave its re-elected officers more money for get-out-the-vote drives and a coordinated organizing plan.

Delegates to the 7th state federation convention increased per capita payments of affiliated unions from 20 cents per month to 25 cents. They lengthened the terms of Pres. Miles C. Stanley, Sec.-Treas. Glen Armstrong and 10 vice presidents to four years, and approved policy statements on current issues.

They voted continued support for 1,700 State Road Commission workers fired by Gov. Arch Moore last March for striking when the Moore administration refused to recognize or bargain with a new union organized by the Laborers. The dispute is in the courts.

The convention also backed 165 Kanawha County school bus drivers who were discharged Oct. 3 when they asked for a meeting to discuss wages.

In other actions, the delegates:

- Called on the Administration and Congress to expand the "war on poverty."
- Urged West Virginia teachers to insist on decent schools, proper classroom materials and better salaries.
- Demanded a state law giving public employes the right to bargain for wages and improved working conditions.
- Urged sweeping changes in the state constitution and court system.
- Pledged strong support for the United Farm Workers' grape boycott.

Stanley reported that despite some setbacks, 1969 will be regarded as a fruitful year for the state labor movement, notably for an improved workmen's compensation bill which for the first time included coverage of "black lung" disease, afflicting coal miners.

Membership rose to 67,800, the highest point in history, despite the withdrawal of 3,000 auto workers, and assets have also grown, Armstrong said.

The two officers also reported that the state body's Unity Housing, Inc., has begun work on 100 low-income housing units costing $1.3 million at Fairmont. Preliminary approval was granted for 100 additional units in Wheeling and applications for funds are pending in Charleston and Huntington—all for approximately $1.3 million each.

Four new vice presidents were elected—Robert Bloksom, Charleston, and John P. McGinnis, Wheeling, both of the Machinists; John Droppleman of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, Fayetteville, and James H. Pearl of the Steelworkers, McMechen.

Horse Shoers to Spur Organizing Campaign

Cleveland—The Journeymen Horse Shoers voted in convention here to increase the union's per capita dues from $7 to $9 a month to meet higher costs and enable the union to expand its organizing efforts.

The 84-year-old union, one of the smallest internationals in the AFL-CIO, mainly represents workers employed at race tracks throughout the nation.

As evidence that organizing is paying off, the convention received a report that its membership is now 313, an increase of nearly 50 since the 1967 convention. New locals have been chartered in Kentucky and Pennsylvania during the two years.

The delegates also amended the union's constitution to extend the term of officers from two to three years and to hold conventions every three years instead of every two.

Pres. Elmer Campbell of Miami, Fla., and Sec.-Treas. Nick Marinelli of Hialeah, Fla., were re-elected without opposition to the three-year terms set by the constitutional change.

Also re-elected without opposition were Vice Presidents Clay Thomas of Chicago, David Pearce of Baltimore and Joseph Young of Seattle. The only new vice president elected is James Lane of Arcadia, Calif. He succeeds Wallace Roehr, also of Arcadia, who declined to seek re-election.

Among other actions, the convention voted to extend the horseshoer apprenticeship period from two to three years. Trainees then have a period of two additional years in which to qualify for membership through examination.

Ruling Stands on Power Of NLRB to Curb Bias

The Supreme Court has let stand a precedent-setting appellate court decision giving the National Labor Relations Board power to order an employer to stop discriminating on the basis of race or national origin.

It refused to review a decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia which held that such discrimination can interfere with workers' rights to organize and bargain collectively.

The appeals court said that racial discrimination can be a "divide and conquer" tool of employers, "setting group against group, thus frustrating the possibility of effective concerted action" against the employer.

The court upheld an NLRB finding that a Texas cotton processing firm was guilty of a number of unfair labor practices against the Packinghouse Workers, which has since merged with the Meat Cutters.

But it went further and ordered the NLRB to consider whether the discrimination reported by the union against Negro and Spanish-speaking workers was itself a violation of the labor law. The NLRB had found the company acted illegally in refusing to bargain with the union on a non-discrimination guarantee in the contract.

The employer had claimed the NLRB couldn't deal with discrimination because that came under the jurisdiction of the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. The court rejected this argument and noted that the EEOC does not have enforcement powers, while the NLRB does. Legislation to give the EEOC power to issue "cease-and-desist" orders against job discrimination has been sought by the AFL-CIO and civil rights groups, but opposed by the Administration.

The Supreme Court also let stand a lower court decision which upheld an overtime pay claim brought by the Postal Clerks against the Post Office Dept.

The union contended that postal workers assigned to work on their regularly-scheduled days off are entitled to overtime rates for those days, even if they don't work more than a five-day week.

The government asked the Supreme Court to review the decision, contending that it would increase expenses at least $34 million a year, but the court refused, thus upholding the decision favoring the union.

Another labor case denied review left standing a lower court decision upholding the authority of a Laborers' district council to remove a local union officer for negligence and incompetence.

In the civil rights area, the Supreme Court followed through on its "no delay" policy in southern school desegregation cases. It refused to consider an appeal by 44 Louisiana school districts which sought to keep "freedom of choice" programs that lower courts had ruled were subterfuges to block desegregation.

Painters Seek Standards on Glass Safety

The Painters have joined with glass industry groups to campaign for firm state standards on the use of safety glass in residential, commercial and public buildings.

Pres. S. Frank Raftery said the union—particularly its glazier membership—has expressed concern over the improper installation of unsafe sliding doors, entrance doors, fixed glass panels and other glazing fixtures in new construction.

The Painters are coordinating the program with the Flat Glass Marketing Association, National Glass Dealers Association and Pittsburgh Plate Glass Industries, Inc.

A committee of the labor-management coalition is now preparing a draft of a comprehensive bill that would supplant the myriad state laws and local building codes on the use of glass in construction.

After the model bill is adopted by the joint group, Raftery said, it will be distributed to all state governors, state agencies, and labor and industrial organizations with a plan to promote the legislation.

Labor's Drive Pressed:

National Plan Called Vital to Health Care

their fees and the hospitals boosted their charges."

As a result, Meany noted, instead of helping our members, "we have simply been making more money for doctors."

It's not long-overdue wage increases for still-underpaid hospital workers that have sent hospital charges soaring to close to $100-a-day, Meany said. Wages for hospital workers have gone up "only a little more than half as fast as the total costs of the hospitals."

The AFL-CIO believes doctors deserve an adequate income, Meany said, but "this indefensible escalation of medical costs is depriving millions of Americans of the health care they need."

Meany noted that labor fought hard for establishment of the Medicare and Medicaid programs to help the elderly and the poor obtain health care. But "some doctors and other health practitioners have pounced on these programs as if they had been legislated as get-rich schemes for the medical profession."

Because of this profiteering, he added, the premium older people must pay for Medicare insurance is constantly going up and "the response to soaring Medicaid costs has been to remove poor people from eligibility altogether and for those still covered to cut back on services."

The only answer, Meany stressed, is national health insurance. "It is one the labor movement has advanced for many years, but we are more determined to achieve it today than ever before."

Meany suggested that prepaid group health plans, such as exist in a number of communities, represent the type of comprehensive health care that should be available under a national system.

Meany suggested these key ingredients for a national program:

"Include every kind of treatment that is necessary to maintain or restore good health . . . preventive services, all types of physicians' services, hospital and nursing home care, home health services, rehabilitation.

"It would be financed like social security, on social insurance principles but with a government contribution, as we are now advocating for social security itself. Since we think that every American is entitled to decent health care, the poor would be exempt from any payment but should be eligible for the same services as anyone else.

"Doctors would continue to practice medicine without interference. But we would expect the national health insurance system to encourage the highest quality of medical care, improvements in the efficiency of its delivery and effective control on its cost."

A 1967 poll showed a "substantial majority" of Americans favor a federal plan, Meany said.

As for cost, he said the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security has estimated that it would be no more and probably less than the nation presently spends for health care—and would provide many more services.

"I say we cannot afford not to have national health insurance," Meany told the conference.

Abel warned that there is little time left before the "crisis in health care turns into a tragedy in health care."

Terming a national health insurance program "inevitable," he added, "so the sooner we establish one, the better. The AMA will scream 'socialized medicine.' But I am not so concerned over what it is called, so long as we get it."

Unions must expand upon their negotiations with employers for prepaid group health plans, but collective bargaining will never fully meet workers' health needs, Abel pointed out.

"Ultimately," he said, "we must combine labor-management contract provisions on health care with government action, as has been done on privately-negotiated pension plans and social benefits."

Abel, like Meany, emphasized the need for controls on exorbitant doctors' profits and for expanded hospital facilities, reasonable drug prices and the availability of health care for workers and their families.

He said the conference, with its exchange of ideas by panels of experts in the health field scheduled for later sessions, "could very well be a landmark in the rising tide of interest which will develop into major health-care reform in the next few years."

"Talking, listening and thinking together, will help us generate the commitment and the answers to solve the health crisis in America," he concluded.

Job Injuries In 1968 Hold At High Rate

On-the-job accidents in 1968 continued at the 1967 rate of 14 disabling injuries per million hours worked in manufacturing — the highest level since 1952, the Labor Dept. reported.

Preliminary data from the Bureau of Labor Statistics showed worsened rates in 12 of 21 major industry groups. Five groups had lower rates and four were unchanged.

The largest increases in work-injury rates for the year were in the food, stone, clay, glass and textile industries. Biggest decreases in rates were in ordnance, lumber, rubber and petroleum refining industries.

The frequency of injuries in contract construction, which has been declining in recent years, rose from 26.7 in 1967 to 26.9 in 1968, BLS reported. The greatest increase in this area was in heavy construction.

The injury rate for coal mining rose from 41.2 to 41.7. The rate for wholesale and retail trade, 11.2 in 1968, was unchanged.

The federal government's rate of 6.9 in 1968 was down from 7.1. Most finance and service industries showed some lowering of injury rates.

TRADE UNION PLAZA offers 77 housing units for low- and moderate-income families in the heart of downtown New Haven, Conn. The co-op housing complex is sponsored by the Greater New Haven Central Labor Council. With the aid of federal rent subsidies, state real estate tax relief and the Licht Foundation, no resident will pay more than 25 percent of his income in rent.

Unions Open Housing Co-op In New Haven

New Haven, Conn.—Trade Union Plaza, a 77-unit housing cooperative, is open and helping ease the housing shortage for low- and moderate-income families here.

The plaza is sponsored by the Greater New Haven Central Labor Council through a non-profit corporation it formed to develop the project.

Some of the units in the development will be reserved for low-income public housing families who will be full members of the co-op. The remaining units will be occupied by moderate-income families.

None of the residents of the plaza will pay more than 25 percent of his income in rent because of agreements under three programs: rent subsidies through the Federal Housing Authority, abatement of real estate taxes allowed by state law, and interest-free down payment loans from the Licht Foundation.

The housing complex consists of two- and three-story buildings, with duplexes and apartments. Three main landscaped areas provide recreational space for the residents.

Interior parking facilities are provided for 57 cars under several buildings in addition to paved exterior parking lots.

Pres. Vincent J. Sirabella of the New Haven AFL-CIO is credited with being the main link between the labor council and the city government in winning the necessary backing to complete the project.

Boris Shishkin, secretary of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee, noted at the dedication of the plaza that labor is totally aware of the nation's urban housing problems. He predicted that the trade union movement will become more deeply involved in sponsoring housing projects in the 1970s.

PARTICIPATING in the dedication of the plaza are from left, Pres. John J. Driscoll of the State AFL-CIO; Pres. Vincent J. Sirabella of the New Haven AFL-CIO; Mrs. Kenneth Diamond, a new tenant; Sec. Boris Shishkin of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee and Sec.-Treas. Joseph C. Bober of the State AFL-CIO.

Cultural 'Renaissance' Linked to Labor's Role

Leaders of federal and state programs to foster the growth of the nation's cultural life look to the trade union movement to provide the large-scale participation needed to achieve "an American Renaissance."

Nancy Hanks, chairman of the National Endowment for the Arts—which administers the federal grants program—and 15 state Arts Council directors took part in an AFL-CIO luncheon discussion of the status of the arts in American life.

Labor participants included Leo Perlis, director of the federation's Dept. of Community Services, and Jack Golodner, executive secretary of the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes.

The pilot Demonstration Arts programs sponsored by the AFL-CIO in five cities was cited as an example of the effort needed to involve all of the people in a community in local cultural programs—both as audiences and as informed participants.

Miss Hanks described the recent election of AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland to the board of directors of the Associated Councils of the Arts as "an excellent omen."

She told the group, "I have as high hopes for this work in cooperation with the unions as anything we have done. Unions can be particularly helpful in state and community councils by broadening the base of participation."

From leaders of state arts councils at the luncheon came expressions of appreciation for labor's role as a "people's lobby" in helping to bring about greater government aid to the arts.

For the first time, one participant noted, there is a "political constituency" for legislation dealing with the arts.

Pay Disparity Termed Threat to Fire Services

Chicago—City fire services will deteriorate and labor unrest will mount if cities continue their efforts to pay fire fighters less than police, Fire Fighters Pres. William H. McClennan warned here.

McClennan, addressing the convention of the International Association of Fire Chiefs here, declared:

"I am convinced that the trend toward disparity (between police and fire fighter pay) and lower budgets for the fire services has been a direct and a major cause of the strikes and the near-strikes that we have experienced in the past two years . . .

"I know that many people are alarmed about strikes in the fire service. To them, I can only say that when cities are ready to deal realistically with the economics of the fire service they're pretty certain to find that strikes will disappear."

The IAFF leader warned that "if the 1970s are to be the decade of the squeeze on the fire service," they may also be "the decade of strikes in the fire service."

"It stands to reason," McClennan said, "that if pay and benefit scales in the fire service don't keep pace, we are going to start losing our attraction for capable, courageous, community-minded men. The best men will go elsewhere.

"What we have to insist upon is that the communities of America face up to their responsibility to give adequate pay to all their uniformed services. They are heading for trouble if they let one service deteriorate . . . in relation to the other."

The IAFF president noted that there has been a continuing rise throughout the years in the number, frequency, cost and casualties as a result of fires in the nation.

"The challenge we face in the 1970s is to win over our fellow citizens and our government officials to an understanding that disparity is not only unfair but, in the long run, dangerous to the fire service and to the community itself," he added.

He called on the Fire Chiefs to join with the IAFF in three areas:

- To see that the federal Fire Research & Safety Act is implemented.
- To develop a continuing program of public information and education in support of an improved fire service.
- To develop community support for improving the fire service.

Meany Is Co-Chairman Of National Unity Week

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany served as a co-chairman of the "Week of National Unity" which was observed Nov. 9-16 as a demonstration of the support of "the silent majority" of Americans.

The invitation to Meany was extended by Bob Hope, national chairman of the unity week.

As Debate Opens:

Haynsworth's Role Cited in Land Sales

"since trustees usually are charged with safeguarding funds and investing them to assure a good return, the acquisition of a farm is an unusual investment."

Although Haynsworth proved a shrewed investor when using his own money—as evidenced by his million-dollar stock portfolio—the pension fund wasn't helped by the farm purchase.

The farm was later sold—at little more than its original cost—to W. Francis Marion, a former law partner of the judge who had been president of the vending firm.

In other transactions, Haynsworth and four of his Vend-A-Matic partners sold themselves two strips of land, part of which they used to build a warehouse which was rented to Burlington Industries, one of the biggest textile chains.

They acted as directors of the corporation when they sold the land to themselves as private individuals.

They were apparently good negotiators. The total cost of the two parcels of land was only $1,750. The property is located across from a textile exhibit hall and near two interstate highways and its value, the newspaper reports, is considerably above the "favorable" purchase price.

Haynsworth still owns his 20 percent interest in the property.

The Senate debate on Haynsworth in effect got under way a day ahead of schedule as Sen. Gordon Allott (R-Colo.) made an impassioned hour-long defense of the judge.

Begging the Senate not to "destroy" Haynsworth, Allott said he was thinking of what it would do to Haynsworth, "his children and his children's children." He said repudiation by the Senate might force Haynsworth "out of his own pride" to resign as a judge of the Court of Appeals.

A fellow-Republican, Sen. Robert P. Griffin (Mich.) answered Allott, saying that the Senate isn't being asked to convict Haynsworth, merely to decide whether he should be advanced to the Supreme Court. He said there is no obligation to confirm every nominee "merely because it can't be proved he beats his wife."

The Senate Judiciary Committee, headed by Mississippi Sen. James O. Eastland and dominated by conservatives of both parties, endorsed the nomination by a slim 10-7 vote. But the actual margin, it turned out, was even closer. Senate Republican Leader Hugh Scott said he had voted with the committee majority in order to give the full Senate a chance to vote on the nomination.

Five committee Democrats, in addition to listing their individual grounds for dissent, joined in a last-minute appeal to the President to withdrew the nomination.

The statement by Senators Birch Bayh (Ind.), Quentin N. Burdick (N.D.), Philip A. Hart (Mich.), Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.) and Joseph D. Tydings (Md.) concluded:

"Some of us see flaws in his extrajudicial activities. Some of us have doubts about his record on the appellate bench. And some of us are concerned about his presentations before committees of Congress. But we all share the feeling that our review of the nominee's record leads us to advise the President to withdraw it."

The White House reportedly was continuing heavy pressure on senators in an effort to pick up the small handful of votes which both sides agree will decide the fate of the nomination.

The four latest announcements from senators who had not previously made public their position added two votes against confirmation and two for the nomination.

Two Kansas Republicans—Senators Bob Dole and James B. Pearson— will vote to confirm Haynsworth; Senators Thomas J. McIntyre (D-N.H.) and Stuart Symington D-Mo.) announced that they will vote to reject the nomination.

Boosters

Senate Votes $1 Billion To Fight Water Pollution

of a $5 billion public works appropriations package by an 86-2 vote.

The education aid controversy resulted in part from a congressional logjam on appropriations — the worst in many years.

Even though the present fiscal year is more than one-third over, most federal agencies and programs have not yet received their current appropriations.

To tide them over—and allow agencies to meet their payrolls and other obligations—Congress periodically passes "continuing resolutions."

The resolution that expired at the end of October had forced schools to get by on less federal aid than they received last year. Under the normal precedents, a new continuing resolution would have held them to last year's level or the amount appropriated by the House—whichever figure was lower for each program.

The House had already voted $1 billion more than the President's budget for aid to education, but the money bill is still being considered in Senate committee.

To force an increase in funds before it is too late to do any good, a coalition of school aid supporters in the House wrote into the new continuing resolution authority for the government to pay out money to schools at the higher rate voted by the House.

This defied all past precedents and the Senate Appropriations Committee was expected to balk at this procedure and insist on the customary money limitation.

But with 48 senators joining in a resolution endorsing the House action, the committee had second thoughts. It complained about the departure from custom and it insisted on an expiration date of Dec. 6 for the resolution, instead of the end of the session as the House had voted. But it agreed to go along with the higher money figure and Senate passage appeared assured as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

The Administration does not have to spend the money. But both the House and Senate have said in effect that Congress wants the money to be spent.

In other congressional developments:

- The Senate Armed Services Committee cleared the Administration's one-sentence draft lottery bill that has already passed the House. Early Senate action was assured after supporters of broader draft reform agreed to wait until the second session to attempt to pass a more comprehensive bill.

Covered by Executive Order

Most of the draft law changes proposed by Pres. Nixon can be accomplished by executive order, including making 19-year-olds the priority group subject to induction. The legislative change would permit a random selection of draftees through what has been termed a lottery.

- A majority of House and Senate members expressed support for Pres. Nixon's policy on Viet Nam. Three hundred congressmen joined in sponsoring a resolution of support and 59 senators have signed letters of support for the U.S. position, addressed to Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge at the Paris peace talks.

- The House Education & Labor Committee broke a deadlock and approved an extension of the anti-poverty program with an increase in funds. With 21 Democrats in favor and 12 Republicans opposed, the committee voted to authorize $300 million more than the $2 billion figure the Administration had sought. The extra money would go to the Head Start program for preschool children, for emergency food and medical service for the poor, and for two new programs of public service jobs for the poor.

IBEW Presses Recruitment Of Minorities

The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers has called on its construction locals throughout the nation to take immediate steps to increase the number of minority group journeymen and apprentices.

IBEW Pres. Charles H. Pillard outlined to the locals an affirmative action program based on the unanimous policy statement of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

It calls for immediate membership for qualified workers who have gained their experience with non-union employers and modification of the local job referral system so that they will have the same priority in employment as present members with comparable qualifications.

Existing requirements for prior employment under the local's collective bargaining agreement should be waived for a one-year period, Pillard told the locals.

He also called on IBEW construction locals to "accelerate your participation in the Apprenticeship Outreach Program in your area or, where no outreach program exists, work through the local Building & Construction Trades Council to establish one." The international union, he said, will provide assistance and help secure financing.

Locals were also urged to negotiate affirmative action programs with employers and to seek the cooperation of minority group organizations "in a program to actively recruit minorities."

Locals, he said, should provide trade union training for new members brought in under the program.

Rail Safety Bill Pressed to Halt Accident Toll

Railroad unions have called for passage of a bill sponsored by Sen. Vance R. Hartke (D-Ind.) and 16 other senators as vital to halting the "alarming increase" in railroad accidents.

A spokesman for the Railway Labor Executives' Association testified before a Senate Commerce subcommittee in support of the measure to provide new federal safety standards on railroads.

Al H. Chesser, chairman of RLEA's safety committee and legislative director for the United Transportation Union, said the Hartke bill was "much better" than a similar Administration bill.

He said the Administration's legislation was vague in a number of its provisions and its penalties section was "totally inadequate."

The Administration proposal, Chesser pointed out, would let the Secretary of Transportation grant exemptions from some standards to carriers on his own motion without hearings. Fines for violations would range from $250 to $750.

By contrast, he said, Hartke's bill would permit fines up to $1,000, require hearings in all cases of alleged violations, and allow the Secretary of Transportation to issue cease-and-desist orders bearing $5,000 fines in case of violations.

Railroad labor also opposed a feature in the Administration bill that would cancel all state and local laws in areas where the Dept. of Transportation issues a safety rule. Hartke's bill would provide that if a state or local law is stronger in the area, it supersedes the new federal standard.

Jobless Rate for Negroes Highest in City Ghettos

The unemployment rate for black workers, which runs about double the white workers' rate nationally, is at its worst in the slums of Los Angeles and Detroit, according to the Labor Dept.

A Bureau of Labor Statistics survey found that the jobless rate for Negroes averaged 15.2 percent in Los Angeles poverty neighborhoods and 13.5 percent in similar areas in Detroit for the year ending July 1, 1969.

Both rates were more than double the 6.5 percent average for the black workers in the nation as a whole over the same 12 months.

BLS also found that jobless rates for blacks were higher than that average in the ghettos of four other cities: Houston, 9.5 percent; Atlanta, 9.4 percent; Chicago, 8.8 percent; and New York, 6.7 percent.

In five of the six cities, particularly high rates of unemployment were discovered among black teenagers in the poorest neighborhoods.

Jobless rates for this group were 45.5 percent in Los Angeles; 40 percent in Detroit, 37.5 percent in Houston, 31.8 percent in Chicago and 29.4 percent in Atlanta.

Only in New York neighborhoods, where the rate was 24.6 percent, was it lower than the 25 percent unemployment rate for black teenagers nationally.

Average weekly earnings among blacks in the slums of the six cities varied widely.

In Houston, 71.1 percent of the black employed women earned less than $65 a week and in Atlanta the percentage earning less than that was 56.6 percent.

Among men, the proportions of full-time Negro workers earning less than $65 a week ranged from 13 percent in Houston and 12.1 percent in Atlanta down to 2 percent in Los Angeles.

Among Spanish-American workers surveyed in three cities' slums, the jobless rates were much higher than the 3.4 percent national rate for the year ending July 1, 1969.

Jobless rates for these workers were 9 percent in New York, 6.5 percent in Houston and 6.1 percent in Los Angeles.

Steelworkers Add 3,000 in Four Elections

Pittsburgh — The Steelworkers added 3,000 members to their ranks in four elections conducted by the National Labor Relations Board in a recent six-day period, the union reported.

Pres. I. W. Abel called the results "encouraging evidence" that USWA's accelerated organizing efforts are proving successful, and that "working men and women still look to unions as their single best hope for progress and security."

The elections were in units of 500 employes of Carrier Corp. in Collierville, Tenn.; 300 office and technical workers at the Ambridge, Pa., plant of the American Bridge Division; 1,600 employes of Wyman-Gordon Co., Worcester, Mass., and 600 employes of Kennedy Van Saun Co., Danville, Pa.

In May, Abel established a Dept. of Organization at union headquarters, headed by Elmer Chatak. The department gives special assistance to district organizing and coordinates inter-district efforts.

Rallies Spur Full Support For Striking GE Workers

ISSUES AT STAKE in the strike of 13 unions against General Electric Co. are outlined at a rally of 600 Philadelphia-area union representatives by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Matthew Guinan. Also shown are AFL-CIO Regional Dir. George Craig, left, and Pres. Edward F. Toohey of the Philadelphia AFL-CIO.

Relief Fund Builds To Aid 13 Unions

By Eugene A. Kelly

The men and women of organized labor lined up solidly at rallies across the nation for a fight to victory in support of 150,000 workers on strike against General Electric Co.

From Seattle to Houston to Atlanta to New York, unions representing more than 13 million workers turned out at 23 separate meetings to back the call of the AFL-CIO for positive action and cash—$1 or more a member for as long as it is needed—while strikers walk GE picket lines.

The message of unity and determination came through loud and clear—from Federation Pres. George Meany at a New York rally and a special convention of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; from Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland at San Francisco and Seattle; and from AFL-CIO vice presidents and other labor spokesmen who spelled out the issues and urged the all-out backing of the entire labor movement.

There were these other developments in the walkout of 13 unions which started Oct. 27:

- The IUE District of Canada, at its convention in Toronto, voted an immediate donation of $20,000 to the strike relief fund, started by the AFL-CIO Executive Council weeks ago with a donation of $50,000.
- The Glass Bottle Blowers executive board authorized a contribution of $70,000 to the strike relief fund, representing a donation of about $1 per member.
- The Philadelphia Joint Board of the Ladies' Garment Workers made an initial pledge of $10,000, and other unions set up machinery to collect membership donations for the strikers.
- The AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee sat in with IUE negotiators at a day-long ses-

House Hikes Coverage of Jobless Aid

The House gave near-unanimous approval to a bill extending unemployment insurance coverage to 4.5 million of the 16.6 million workers who now have no income protection if they lose their jobs.

The House bill also provides for an extended period of federally-financed jobless benefits during periods of high unemployment. To pay for the improvements, it raises the payroll tax slightly and increases the taxable wage base for the first time in the program's history.

But any action to set federal standards on amount and duration of state benefits will have to be initiated by the Senate. The House took up the bill under a "no amendment" rule. Thus, both supporters and opponents of federal benefit standards joined in the 337-8 majority for the legislation.

The bill drafted by the House Ways & Means Committee provides less coverage and a smaller rise in the tax base than the Administration had sought.

And the Administration's proposal, which relied on the states to

Meany Hits Chamber on Wage Stand

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has accused the Chamber of Commerce of "blatant hypocrisy" in blaming wages for inflation and urging employers to "risk" strikes to save the nation.

The hypocrisy of a Chamber statement, Meany said, was exposed by an article appearing in the Wall Street Journal "on the very day" the statement was issued.

Noting that the Chamber made no mention of holding down profits and business executives' pay to fight inflation, Meany said "the reason is obvious" in that past Journal stories have shown profits are causing inflation and the latest article focuses on executives' salaries.

The Chamber statement charged that labor costs are the "chief ingredient" in inflation and warned against "union power" being used to get further wage boosts for workers.

Wage increases become a "tax on all consumers" because they result in higher prices, the Chamber said. However, it also expressed concern about consumer resistance that is making it difficult to "pass on" wage costs.

The Chamber concluded that "the business community may have to risk substantial work stoppages in order to save the currency."

The Wall Street Journal reported on a survey of 530 companies that found "the average chief executive's compensation jumped 9.8 percent in 1968," the largest yearly gain in 15 years.

The survey considered compensation to include salaries, bonuses and stock paid or credited to executives, but excluded pension and stock option benefit plans.

The total pay of one in every six executives was up more than 25 percent, according to the survey, and almost half of this group was up more than 40 percent.

The largest gain, 18.8 percent, was made by top brass in the motor vehicles and equipment industries. Three industry groups—paper and allied products, petroleum and rubber and plastic products—showed increases for executives averaging 15 percent or more.

Corporate officials who "have grumbled" in past years that their pay raises weren't keeping pace with inflation "have been making up lost ground in giant strides," the newspaper said.

The reason for the huge pay raises for executives, it decided, was that "1968 was a year of fat profits" and bonus plans tied to profits "paid out handsomely."

In his statement, Meany said, "It is those 'fat profits'—not wage increases—that have caused inflation."

He cited Labor Sec. George P. Shultz's recent report that the me-

For Family of Four:

Poverty Panel Asks $2,400 Income Base

A federally-guaranteed minimum income of $2,400 per year for a family of four instead of the $1,600 proposed by the Administration has been recommended by a presidential commission appointed in January 1968 by Pres. Johnson.

The study, "Poverty Amid Plenty: The American Paradox," also differs from the Administration's requirement that welfare recipients be available for work. The commission said instead that income from employment is out of reach of most of the nation's 25 million poor.

The 21-member commission included AFL-CIO Vice Presidents A. Philip Randolph and David Sullivan. While agreeing with the "basic thrust and tenor of the report," Sullivan issued a supplementary report dissenting on some issues. (Excerpts, Page 5.)

Administration proposals, while recommending a base income of $1,600, would add another $750 in food stamps for a total of $2,350—not far from the commission's proposal of $2,400. The commission recommended that food stamps be abolished.

Similarities between the study and Administration proposals prompted presidential adviser Daniel P. Moynihan to comment on the "extraordinary compatibility" of the study with the Administration plan.

However, basic differences exist. Besides the variations on work requirements and food stamps, the

Senate Showdown Set On Judge Haynsworth

A dwindling handful of still-uncommitted senators held the balance of power as a closely-divided Senate prepared to vote on whether to confirm the nomination of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., to the Supreme Court.

The vote was scheduled for Nov. 21, after this issue of the AFL-CIO News went to press.

It had been expected earlier, but Haynsworth supporters said they needed more time for debate. This was widely interpreted as a need for more time for the White House to try to win back several of the Republican senators who have indicated their unhappiness with the nomination.

On Nov. 18, when Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield tried unsuccessfully to get a unanimous consent for a vote by midweek, Sen. Ernest F. Hollings (D-S.C.) acknowledged to newsmen that he didn't think Haynsworth would be confirmed if the vote were taken "at this very moment."

Viet Nam Unions Grow, Assume Greater Roles

The Vietnamese Confederation of Labor (CVT)—20 years old this month—is growing, thriving and "entering a new phase of responsibility," its leader told Washington newsmen.

"Just as 20 years is considered a mark of maturity in a man, so is it a mark of maturity in our labor movement," CVT Pres. Tran Quoc Buu declared.

Buu, who came to the United States to confer with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and other federation leaders, was the guest of Meany and a number of members of the Executive Council at a Washington luncheon.

At a later press conference, Buu described the function of the strongly anti-Communist CVT, explained its future goals and reaffirmed its close cooperation with the AFL-CIO.

The CVT leader was accompanied by Nguyen Van Thang, assistant to Buu and director of the confederation's department of international affairs.

AFL-CIO Dir. of International Affairs Jay Lovestone introduced Buu and Thang as "two trade union fighters for peace and freedom who have often paid a heavy price for their roles."

Buu spoke of his five years in jail for resistance to French rule of Viet Nam, his later flight from North Viet Nam to avoid a Com-

NATIONAL HEALTH INSURANCE "is an idea whose time has come," Sen. Thomas F. Eagleton (D-Mo.) told a luncheon session of the Washington conference on "The Crisis in Health Care" sponsored by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. Eagleton also urged unions to organize grassroots protests to Administration-proposed slashes in funds for health programs, including cancer and heart research.

IUD Conference Told:

Health Care Crisis Hinges on Funding

By Duane Emme

Two U.S. senators have urged labor to mobilize its full strength against Administration-proposed slashes in health funds and for a system of universal health insurance.

Union efforts in these areas, they told a conference sponsored by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., can be the difference between ending a "crisis" in health care or watching it become a catastrophe.

Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.) said achievement of national health insurance "must become a prime goal of unions." Sen. Thomas F. Eagleton (D-Mo.) termed it "an idea whose time has come."

The Washington conference was attended by more than 350 representatives of unions, central labor bodies and state federations. Leaders of a number of health groups also were on hand.

Although the two-day meeting took no actions and was not intended to, views expressed by speakers, panels and participants talking from the floor showed a clear concensus for:

- Enactment of a national health insurance system as the only way of achieving a "right" Congress has often spelled out in the past—the right of all citizens to adequate medical care.
- Government action to expand the nation's hospitals and health facilities, train more doctors and nurses, control skyrocketing medical costs and increase health research.
- Greater emphasis by unions on negotiating new health plans and improving existing ones.

Yarborough attacked the Administration for proposing slashes of health funds previously urged by Pres. Johnson in a budget that "already was very austere in this area."

He cited proposed cuts of millions in heart and cancer research programs, hospital construction and modernization and loans to medical students.

"We have had a number of Administrations that didn't press hard enough for new health programs," Yarborough said, "but this is the first one I've known to seek a cutback in what we have."

Yarborough, who is chairman of a Senate subcommittee that handles health legislation, promised an all-out fight for health care and called upon unions to help him.

Eagleton, who serves on the subcommittee, said that "for now, the most important contribution that the 91st Congress can make to the nation's health is to fully fund the programs we have on the books."

He asked unions to organize "a constituency for better health care in America" that will let the Administration and Congress know "that the country cannot afford the kind of 'fiscal responsibility' that results in cutting the health budget to the bone. . . ."

AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman said that national health insurance must be shaped "to meet the kind of problems we have talked about in this conference, and it is up to us to see that it does."

The program, he said, should have universal coverage and should be financed on a tripartite basis under social security with the government, employer and worker each paying one-third of the cost.

Benefits, he said, should cover hospitalization; physician services in the office, home and hospital; nursing care; home health services; psychiatric services; eye examinations; dental care; and preventive health services, such as physical examinations.

The AFL-CIO, Seidman emphasized, is not advocating a government operated health system such as Britain has.

"It would not interfere with the clinical practice of medicine," he said. "It would be a system for financing comprehensive health care for all Americans with incentives for improving quality, enhancing efficiency and controlling costs."

National health insurance would cost "no more and perhaps less than we are now spending for personal health services" that fail to provide adequate care for all, Seidman said.

The conference heard a description of Sweden's government-operated health program from Bengt Janzon, it's director of public information, who has been visiting the United States.

He said the hallmark of any health system should be "that the right patient gets the right care at the right time for the right cost."

Sweden's main problem in the health care field now, Janzon reported, is to develop health centers that will provide treatment away from the hospital. "There has been too much dependence on the hospital in our country," he stated.

Other main conference speakers included Jerome Pollack, associate dean of the Harvard Medical School; Dr. George Silver, executive associate for health, Urban Coalition; and Dr. John Adriani, chairman of the American Medical Association's council on drugs.

A panel of authorities on bargaining for health care plans discussed ways and means of expanding such plans to bring the worker and his family improved benefits.

The panelists were John F. Tomayko, Steelworkers director of pensions and insurance; William Bainter of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Thomas G. Moore, Jr., of the California Council on Health Plan Alternatives; and Richard Shoemaker of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

Another panel urged unions to promote and make use of prepaid group practice plans. The speakers were Dr. I. S. Falk of the Yale Medical School; Dr. James Brindle, president of Health Insurance Plan of Greater New York, and Ronald Epstein of Group Health Association of America, Inc.

Impact of General Electric Strike Felt Throughout the Community

General Electric communities are hurting from the strike of 150,000 union members and they expect the pain to grow worse.

That's the word from around the country as GE refuses to budge from its one-and-only offer and pickets continue to march in the 13-union strike that started Oct. 27.

The walkout affects plants and workers from coast to coast "but nowhere is its impact more graphic—or more potentially devastating—than in this Mohawk Valley community of 80,000," the New York Times reported from Schenectady, N.Y.

Reporter James M. Naughton of the Times wrote that "when 12,500 members of the IUE walked off their jobs here . . . they left behind a payroll of $380,000 a day.

Despite diversification, few residents believe the city could "get along without the cluster of red brick buildings on the site selected 83 years ago by Thomas Alva Edison," Naughton reported.

His story continued: "One measure of the strike's impact" is "based on the theory that each payroll dollar circulated five times in a community, from worker to merchant to supplier to wholesaler to banker."

If that is so, the paper notes, more than $4 million in wages had been bypassed in mid-November for a "staggering $20 million loss to the area's economy."

So far, Naughton says, union members are optimistic, company spokesmen forbearing and businessmen tolerant as they anticipate "another ordeal" like the strike of 1966.

Most local merchants seem willing to extend credit while the strike lasts—Bond's Clothes extended its payment deadline 90 days after strike's end; a bank told one GE worker "any time you can't make a payment, don't make it," the reporter wrote.

The only holdout was said to be the power company—and union members believe it will change its mind.

At Pittsfield, Mass., where the 5,500 GE strikers represent about 20 percent of the county's 25,000 industrial workers, the Berkshire Eagle told its readers that even in its second week the strike was "hurting the Pittsfield economy."

The loss to the community of nearly $1 million a week in wages of GE strikers "is a blow that will become more severe if, as is expected, the strike lasts for some time," the Eagle said.

"The message of what a strike of this magnitude can mean" was related to Reporter Thomas O. Morton of the Eagle by merchants like Charles Frank, who runs a luncheonette near GE's main gate, and James Mancivalano of Mancy's Barber Shop. Frank posted a sign in his window: "Closed for the Duration of the GE Strike." Mancy's business has been "off 30 to 40 percent" for about a month.

Affects Everyone

"The strike has a lot to do with it," Mancivalano said, adding "most all the barbers I know say the same thing. It has affected everyone. They're all crying the blues."

The Eagle itself was feeling the impact with advertising linage down about 6 percent in October, and the ad manager predicts a worse slump in November. Radio station WBEC reported a 9 percent drop in business and ordered a cost-reduction program.

New car sales were down 20 percent, used cars 50 percent at Pete's Motors. The county's biggest food chain said a decrease in sales volume started early this month. Other businessmen had income slowups too, except the Mayfair Beauty Salon, where business still was booming and more help needed.

The Miami Herald said in a dispatch from Fort Lauderdale that Broward County builders, already squeezed by an electricians' strike against Florida Power & Light Co., "soon will feel the pinch" of the shutdown at GE.

Local developers, it said, are "rapidly running out of appliances they sorely need" to put finishing touches on houses and apartments due to open in January for the Gold Coast peak season of winter visitors.

"If the strike continues much longer, there'll be empty houses sitting there without appliances," Mike Brennan, director of development for Hollywood Inc. told the Herald.

Condominiums scheduled for prospective owners in December will have "real trouble" getting appliances, another developer said.

Chicago Tribune Blocks Labor Ad on GE Strike

Chicago—The Chicago Tribune has two sets of standards for its advertising, General Electric Co. strikers discovered.

The self-proclaimed "world's greatest newspaper" had no scruples about accepting full-page advertisements from GE but set up a series of road blocks to prevent the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee from telling its side of the story in paid space.

An officer of the CBC's advertising agency said he believes the Tribune used "subterfuge" to keep the labor ad from appearing. Apparently it has a double standard for its ads, the agency reported.

The agency mailed an "insertion order" reserving two thirds of a page in the Tribune for Nov. 4, later changed the date to Nov. 7.

On Nov. 6, a Tribune advertising representative in New York City called the agency to report that it had no instructions as to the date, but after "investigating" said the instructions had been found "lying on a secretary's desk" for a couple of weeks.

Also on Nov. 6, the Tribune ad man reported that it would be "impossible," because of lack of space, for the ad to run the next day. Besides, the ad would have to be labeled "political" and the committee would have to fill out a special form, the Tribune man reported with a straight face.

The questionnaire requires names of union officials, bank reference, character references, etc., the committee's agency was told.

In addition, the words "paid political advertisement" would have to appear in three places at the top of the ad and in a boldface line at the bottom, along with the names of at least two officials who were "paying for the ad."

Furthermore, it would have to be paid in advance.

The committee refused these conditions, and the ad did not run Nov. 7 or any other day. GE's own ad, latest in a series, did run, however. That was on Nov. 12, when it appeared without any mention of paid political advertising or the names of two officers who were "paying for the ad."

Anna Kethly Lauded On 80th Birthday

Labor has sent "heartfelt congratulations" to Anna Kethly—"a stalwart fighter for freedom, democracy and social justice"—on the occasion of her 80th birthday.

In a letter to Miss Kethly, now living in Belgium, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said "history will never forget your role" in the October 1956 uprising by the Hungarian people in an attempt to throw off a Communist dictatorship.

Meany told Miss Kethly, who is the last surviving leader of democratic government in Hungary, that "your courage in the face of persecution, prison and hardships will always be an inspiring example for freedom-loving people everywhere."

Rallies Spur Solid Support For 13 Striking GE Unions

sion with GE management in New York. GE said no to 37 IUE proposals, mostly on non-economic issues, and referred three to subcommittee.

- IUE Local 761 of Louisville, Ky., filed a $5 million lawsuit accusing GE of invading the privacy of strikers by round-the-clock surveillance—taping strikers' conversations and filming their activities. Also it petitioned for a court order to restrain these management activities.
- GE management in Schenectady, N. Y., sent letters to the homes of striking employes saying "while you are losing pay, Westinghouse workers are getting the work you might have done." It invited strikers to return to work but there were no takers, the Coordinated Bargaining Committee reported.

Meanwhile, GE passed the court-set deadline for filing an appeal to the Supreme Court of a 1966 National Labor Relations Board decision that IUE and other unions have a right to choose members of their own bargaining committees without company interference. That landmark ruling, upheld by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, established coordinated bargaining as a lawful union technique.

In Pittsburgh, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and other coordinated unions reported no progress on any major issue after a negotiating meeting with Westinghouse. The latter contract has been extended on a day-to-day basis while the talks continue.

Meany, who is CBC chairman, was scheduled to speak at the New York rally Nov. 20 and the IUE convention Nov. 21. The committee has representatives from IUE, IBEW, the Machinists, Steelworkers, Technical Engineers, Carpenters, Plumbers, Allied Industrial Workers, Sheet Metal Workers and Flint Glass Workers. Also coordinating their bargaining and strike activities are the unaffiliated Teamsters, Auto Workers and United Electrical Workers.

The strike support rallies drew overflow audiences of area union representatives in most cities. At each, spokesmen for the strikers voiced firm determination to stay on the picket lines until GE agrees to a contract in keeping with its expanding profitability and the basic needs of its workers.

At San Francisco, trade unionists from six West Bay area counties cheered Kirkland's call to "ride out" the strike "no matter how long it takes."

There is only one way, he said, that GE can be brought to the point of bargaining in good faith. That way, he stressed, is to conduct a successful strike. "That and that alone can civilize this company," Kirkland declared.

He warned representatives of 300,000 area union members that GE is "spearheading a concentrated, calculated effort by American industry to make labor the scapegoat for inflation, to make sure that labor bears the brunt of controls." And GE is speaking, he added, for elements of the government and the Administration.

Kirkland charged that GE acts as if it is above the law. He cited a long list of labor law violations of which the nation's largest electrical manufacturing company has been found guilty—spying, unlawful questioning of employes, punishing employes for testifying before the NLRB, discharge for union activities, making unilateral changes in its union contracts, and refusing to bargain in good faith. The last charge has been upheld by the NLRB and the courts in cases allied to Boulwarism—the company's practice of take-it-or-leave-it, one-offer bargaining, fashioned by Lemuel Boulware, its one-time labor relations director.

Labor's objective is not to break the company, not to dictate prices, not even to restrain its huge profits, Kirkland emphasized. "All we want is genuine collective bargaining."

More than 1,000 delegates to the rally in Los Angeles came to their feet when ILGWU Pres. Louis Stulberg declared "GE has declared war on American labor and we stand ready to fight back—as a united labor movement."

"This is not a strike brought on by any union," Stulberg said. "The war has been declared by one of the richest, toughest and meanest corporations in America."

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge assured an Atlanta rally of more than 500 that "the striking workers are completely fed up with GE and its style of bargaining—a style that has produced for the workers the same buying power in 1969 as in 1960, although productivity is up 40 percent, and pensions, vacations and job security lag behind" other major industries.

Rally Chairman John Wright, president of the Atlanta AFL-CIO, announced creation of a Georgia Citizens Committee for Justice at GE, and a labor committee to help man picket lines, raise funds, and spread the story of the strike caused by GE tactics.

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings, main speaker at the Louisville rally, said the strike is a basic fight for basic objectives and "it's going to be won by the most basic of all trade union approaches—unity."

The unions are fighting this basic fight, Jennings said, "because GE has never accepted collective bargaining. It has bent every effort, sent out a torrent of propaganda and unleashed its brute money" to divide and defeat its employes.

Transport Workers Pres. Matthew Guinan told more than 600 at the Philadelphia rally that the important issue in the strike is the wage question but also of major importance is Boulwarism. He declared "this strike is going to be won, no matter how long it takes."

At Oakland, Calif., AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher reported to 300 unionists that GE's take-it-or-leave-it non-bargaining posture is "just one symptom of a nationwide drive by big business to destroy collective bargaining."

GE Bargaining Unit Disavows SDS Acts

The AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee of General Electric and Westinghouse Unions took no part in a plan by the Students for a Democratic Society to picket the Labor Dept. during the recent Washington Mobilization, the committee said.

"We resent and reject any attempts by outside groups to exploit the cause of the GE strikers for the advancement of their own political or ideological aims," the unions declared. They added "we have not solicited the support of the SDS, nor were we in any way a part of the plan to demonstrate." The committee engages only in coordinated union bargaining, they said.

GE STRIKERS are "completely fed up with the General Electric Co. and its style" of arrogant bargaining, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge tells an Atlanta labor rally which pledged to back the 150,000 strikers to victory. Also shown are AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Oliver W. Singleton (left) and Billy Henderson of the Carpenters, of the Coordinated Bargaining Committee.

Upholsterers Leader Alfred R. Rota Dies

Chicago—Alfred R. Rota, 73, a vice president of the Upholsterers since 1937, died in hospital here. He had been in poor health for some time. Funeral services were scheduled Nov. 21 at Bartz-O'Donnell Funeral Home here.

Born in Italy, Rota came to this country when he was 10, living first in Kansas and later moving to Chicago. In addition to serving as a vice president, he had been recording secretary and business representative of Upholsterers Local 18 for many years.

His post as vice president will be filled by the union's general board for the interim period preceding the next convention in 1970.

'Trying to Start a Fire or Something?'

Meany Charges 'Greed' In GE's Price Increases

General Electric's latest announcement of price increases shows "that GE's pricing policy, like its labor relations policy, is based on simple greed," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany charged.

The company announced that it is raising prices on electric housewares by an average 3.3 percent. The announcement followed an earlier one of increases on appliances and other products ranging up to 8.5 percent.

GE is one of the wealthiest corporations in the world, with profits in the third quarter of 1969 up 11 percent over the same period a year ago, Meany said. "Yet GE isn't satisfied."

"It has now raised prices on all articles a housewife buys," he pointed out, "and seeks to put most of the blame on its workers, pretending this increase was necessary because of higher labor costs."

Meany, chairman of the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee with General Electric, charged that the firm forced nearly 150,000 of its workers to strike "to gain decent wages and working conditions."

Yet, he added, their need for more money is due to inflation "caused by the pricing and profit policies of companies like GE."

Noting that the firm has pictured itself as "holding the line against inflation" in newspaper advertisements, Meany concluded, "This latest price increase destroys GE's pretense of being an inflation fighter."

Chamber Stand On Wages Hit As 'Hypocrisy'

dian wage increase in new collective bargaining contracts negotiated this year is "a little under 2 percent for 1969," after accounting for price rises.

"Moreover," Meany continued, "the buying power of the average non-supervisory worker's weekly take-home pay, in recent months, has not been much greater than a year ago—or in 1965."

The gain in compensation of an individual big business executive in 1968 "is more than the average worker earned in the entire year," Meany pointed out.

He also stressed that workers "are hit hardest by the government's severely restrictive economic policies, including the highest interest rates in 100 years, that are increasing unemployment and boosting prices still further."

Under these conditions, Meany said, workers and their unions are bargaining for wage gains to offset price increases and "achieve a fair share of the gains of economic progress. That is their only recourse."

As for the Chamber, he concluded, before issuing "any more free advice on how to halt inflation, it ought to examine its own closet for skeletons."

Lee Pressman Dies, MEBA General Counsel

New York—Lee Pressman, general counsel of the Marine Engineers and prominent labor lawyer and New Deal figure, died here at the age of 63.

He had served as counsel for the CIO and the Steelworkers from the founding of the organizations until 1948. Marine Engineers Pres. Jesse M. Calhoun described him as "a wonderful friend, a deeply admired attorney and a brilliant negotiator."

To Win the Peace

THE GATHERING of over 250,000 mostly young, white middle-class Americans in Washington to demonstrate for "peace now" reflects more than anything else a lack of understanding of a strategy first enunciated by Pres. John F. Kennedy.

In the early 1960s the nation was faced with the aggressive strategy of the Communist world to ignite "wars of liberation" in the underdeveloped areas of the world. U.S. policy had been keyed during the 1950s to major reliance on nuclear weapons. The problem was to devise a strategy to meet the Communist thrusts without blowing up the world.

The Kennedy Administration came up with the concept of using more-or-less conventional weapons and tactics to repel the "wars of liberation" and to commit limited U.S. resources to fight a limited war for limited goals.

In Viet Nam this meant committing American arms and troops to repel aggression by the North Vietnamese; to secure the freedom of the South Vietnamese to determine their own government: limited aid to secure a limited objective.

This has been the U.S. role; neither to hurl nuclear warheads nor to allow the aggressor Communists to take over by force of arms. The Vietnamese battle has dominated the decade and has sorely tried the old American view that wars are won or lost with finality and crisp decision. This has not been and cannot be the case in Viet Nam or anywhere else in the world where Communist arms and money are dedicated to new aggressions.

It is difficult to believe that the college-trained youths that predominated on the monument grounds do not understand the nature of the Communist thrust and the strategy developed to meet it. In their cries for "relevancy" they must surely know that peace has no relevancy without freedom. They must surely understand what happened in Czechoslovakia.

A FEW WEEKS AGO the Citizens Committee for Peace and Freedom in Viet Nam, whose organizing chairman is former Sen. Paul H. Douglas, reported on the findings of a special commission it had set up to visit Southeast Asia and Paris and report back on the existing situation. They said in part:

"An American policy of gradual disengagement is feasible, provided the withdrawal of U.S. forces is closely geared to demonstrated improvement in South Vietnamese capabilities and is not forced prematurely by war-weary American opinion."

Among the commission's recommendations were free elections, opposition to an "imposed" coalition government, reciprocal troop withdrawals. The group said the United States should urge "that the Vietnamese government broaden its base among non-Communist elements of the population and that it seek new support in the countryside."

The committee, strongly opposed to risking a general war in Asia, notes that "we do not seek a military victory in Viet Nam; we seek to deny military victory to the enemy. We do not seek to win the war; we seek to win the peace."

Its latest appraisal is that "we are in a desperate race between the natural impatience of the American people and their education to the true situation. . . . It is ironical that at the very time when the prospect for peace with freedom is rising in Viet Nam, confidence in a successful outcome is at its lowest ebb here at home."

Hook It Up!

A Word Edgewise:

Support for Defense of Viet Nam Based on Firm Liberal Tenets

By John P. Roche

THERE ARE TIMES when I think that the media have gone into Bill Buckley's bag. Reading the papers and watching TV, one gets the impression that the liberals are rapidly being driven underground by the conservatives, particularly on the college campuses.

The New York Times, for example, ran a headline a while back which flatly announced that "Conservatives Take Control of Once Embattled San Francisco State College." I fully expected to learn that Buckley's National Review was now required reading and that the college had established the Barry Goldwater Institute of Nuclear Studies.

The "conservative" triumph was, however, of a quite different order. It amounted to San Francisco State's re-establishment of a decent academic environment, the jailing of a Negro militant who last year urged students to bring guns to campus to deal with "racism," the dismissal of a professor who disrupted a faculty meeting, and punitive action against faculty members who cooperated in last year's nasty confrontation. If anyone who opposes the conversion of a university into a battlefield is henceforth to be a "conservative," the liberal ball game is obviously over.

Up in Massachusetts, we have had the same semantic problem. The faculty caucus at Harvard which opposed the politicization of the university and supported fair but effective sanctions against disruption has been dubbed the "conservative."

And after I spoke at our high school Oct. 15, in support of U.S. policy in Southeast Asia, my daughter asked me if it was true that I was a "conservative." Since I am supporting the Republic of Viet Nam on almost precisely the same basis that, 30 years ago, I supported the Spanish Republic, I found this rather amusing.

But it is also annoying. Over the last half century, American liberals have been in the front rank of those fighting for rational authority. Take as an example the struggle for racial equality, which involved the massive employment of coercive legal sanctions against segregationists who tried to prevent the implementation of the 14th Amendment.

If a white militant had called upon his fellows to arm themselves and fight for their alleged rights, we would have popped him in the bucket in half an hour for contempt of court.

If teachers had gone out of their classrooms in protest against instructing desegregated classes, we would have instantly called for their replacement.

If state funds were employed to publish a student newspaper calling for resistance to desegregation, our lawyers would have moved for an injunction.

IF STATE OFFICIALS intervened with force, we would have called for the National Guard or the Army.

I was never under the impression that this made us "conservatives." Any more than I believe that, in the area of foreign relations, opposition to isolationism, "fortress America," and the withdrawal syndrome makes one "conservative." There are three hot points in the cold war: Europe, the Middle East, and Southeast Asia.

In my judgment, American support for the defense of Berlin, Israel, and Viet Nam is founded on the same principle—and it is a liberal principle. Historically speaking, isolationism is the bench mark of the American conservative.

But we live with the "corruption of the word." The result is that any individual who opposes the evangelical fervor of true believers (on matters foreign or domestic), or insists that a university is not a zoo, is simply written off as a "conservative." I hope this involuntary immigration will do as much for Bill Buckley's intellectual development as it will for his ego.

Incomes Report Questioned:

Higher Minimum Wage Pressed As Weapon Against Poverty

The following is excerpted from a statement by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. David Sullivan, concurred with by Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph, on the report of the President's Commission on Income Maintenance Programs. Vice Presidents Sullivan and Randolph were members of the commission which was established by Pres. Johnson.

I AM IN FUNDAMENTAL agreement with the basic tenor and thrust of the report and I therefore associate myself with its main conclusions and recommendations. The commission has developed a report which I consider to be the most thorough investigation of poverty in America that has ever been published. However, I would like to express a separate viewpoint on a few important issues.

One criticism I would make of the report, which cuts across specific recommendations, is that it is too arbitrary and negative about the potentialities of programs other than the income supplement for both preventing poverty, which is of critical importance, as well as for relieving a great deal of existing poverty.

I have in mind such things as the minimum wage program, training and employment programs, the various social insurance programs, as well as other programs including health services, housing programs, day care, etc.

With respect to these programs, the report assumes a rather peculiar position. After analyzing each of these programs, it points out with respect to one after another that it is not a panacea, that it alone is not enough to wipe out poverty.

But that is no reason to minimize the contribution these programs can make to the elimination of poverty—each of them individually and all of them considered together. If we make proper use of all of these programs to the maximum extent possible, we will prevent much needless poverty and remove many millions of people from their present poverty.

This is important not only for the people who would be directly helped but also because there would then be far fewer people who would need the income supplement. If fewer people had to depend on the income supplement, there would be a much better chance of getting that supplement soon to an adequate level. Thus, even the people receiving the income supplement would benefit indirectly but very significantly if we made the maximum use of all of these other programs.

The proposed income supplement of $2,400 for a family of four is higher than welfare payments in some states and higher than the $1,600 basic payment in the President's welfare reform proposal but it is not nearly high enough. (The President's proposal calls for supplementing the basic $1,600 payment by food stamps valued at $750 for a total of $2,350. The commission's proposal calls for elimination of food stamps.)

This amount, which is proposed as the total federal contribution to the program, provides only $43 a month per person or approximately the same as the average payment today for families in the Aid to Families With Dependent Children (AFDC) program, which the commission regards as totally inadequate.

The $2,400 is nearly one-third below the official poverty line of $3,553 for 1968. With the rapid increase in the cost of living since then, the poverty level would be significantly higher today. Yet, as the report makes clear, the official government poverty line is an arbitrary figure which is not only undoubtedly too low but fails to take account of the fundamental problem of extreme income inequality.

The proposed $2,400 payment is even further below the lowest four-person family budget of the Bureau of Labor Statistics. According to BLS, in 1967 over $4,800 was needed "to meet the requirements for physical health and social well-being of family members, the nurture of children and participation in community activities." Of course, that $4,800 figure for 1967 would be considerably higher today.

The commission was not asked to make recommendations on the basis of purely pragmatic considerations or even on the basis of dollar costs. We were asked to give our best judgment on what this country ought to do to eliminate poverty.

The report sets forth in the most graphic manner the incalculable harm continued poverty does, not to its immediate victims but to our nation as a whole. It emphasizes in the most emphatic terms the urgency of eradicating the continued want and deprivation of the most disadvantaged of our fellow citizens.

Moreover, the report makes clear that to rid our nation of the scourge of poverty is not impossible. The report states: "It is possible to assure economic security for all Americans within the basic framework of existing political and economic institutions. It is time to construct a system which will provide that security."

BECAUSE I BELIEVE that to postpone that commitment will make the goal of eliminating poverty less and not more likely of achievement, I am firmly convinced that the universal income supplement the commission has recommended should assure to its recipients an income no lower than the official government poverty level. If the commission did not wish to take this step immediately, it should have at least recommended a tight timetable for early achievement of that objective.

The report virtually ignores the minimum wage as a weapon in the fight against poverty. Yet the minimum wage has through the years prevented much poverty and could in the future be an even more powerful weapon in the fight against poverty.

It is estimated that if the protection of the minimum wage is extended to all workers and it is raised to $2 an hour, 4 million people will be lifted out of poverty, one-sixth of the poor.

We have somehow gotten used to the idea of the "working poor" in this country. These are people who work fulltime, all year, at jobs which are needed and contribute to the economy and yet are paid at sub-poverty wages.

This is wrong and I think the commission had a duty to say that it is wrong. Therefore, as a fundamental aspect of an overall anti-poverty program, the commission should have recommended extension of the minimum wage to all those still denied its protection as well as a substantial increase in the minimum wage.

Forced Unions to Strike:

GE's Refusal to Budge in Talks Held Threat to All Bargaining

GENERAL ELECTRIC'S flat "take-it-or-leave-it" stand threatens "the whole concept of collective bargaining," a spokesman for the GE strikers charged.

The nationwide strike against GE, now in its fourth week, "is indeed a fight for the survival of the American labor movement," declared James D. Compton, steering committee chairman of the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee for GE and Westinghouse unions.

Despite months of negotiations, the company refused to agree "on any single issue," Compton said. He said the unions' basic goal is a "secure, three-year agreement—with annual improvements."

"The company is apparently strike-happy on this issue," Compton asserted, "they want to have us in strikes every single year." Compton appeared on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview.

Compton stressed that the unions' wage proposal at General Electric is no "pie-in-the-sky proposition," but reflects only "what has happened to GE workers over the past 10 years." He said there is "absolutely no relationship" between GE's current profits picture and its wage offer. "They have consistently refused to discuss their profits picture," he noted, while insisting that "they cannot afford the wage increase."

By Press Associates, Inc.

IF YOU'RE THROWN A CURVE one of these days either on your wage needs or your job security, don't be too surprised—it may be the Phillips Curve.

This curve, that seems to fascinate economists, was devised by British economist A. W. Phillips in 1958. It attempts to measure statistically the relationship between price changes and employment—in brief, the so-called trade-off between anti-inflationary moves and jobs.

Clearly the United States is going through a period right now testing the validity of the Phillips Curve.

In any event, the Phillips Curve indicates without much argument that the degree of inflation you are willing to take has an equally profound influence on the rate of unemployment. The balance is a precarious one and economists admit that drawing that nice balance is extremely difficult.

During the Eisenhower Administration, the balance went against workers and their jobs. Eisenhower did pretty well on the inflation front. Between 1953, when he came into office and 1961 when his term ended, the Consumer Price Index went up 11.9 percent or about 1.5 percent a year.

On the job front, however, Eisenhower didn't do so well. "Tight money" policies produced three recessions which, in turn, took the unemployment rate up from the 3.1 percent which Truman left it at, to 5.6 percent with a high one month of over 7 percent.

President Nixon entered office with a 3.3 percent unemployment rate left him by the Johnson Administration. In September 1969 the rate had climbed to 4 percent and was a shade less than that at 3.9 percent during October.

"Tight money" is upon us again and the pinch for mortgage money is hitting the housing market with a stunning blow. Yet prices are still continuing to climb and we have the paradox of a high price level with a slowing down of the economy and a relatively high level of employment.

Nixon economists are trying hard to convince the American public that all is going according to program, that the economy is beginning to cool, that price levels will begin to reflect this in a matter of months and that unemployment won't be allowed to get out of hand.

IT IS HERE that economists differ. Labor economists, with memories of the Eisenhower years, are far from convinced that their idea of a "tolerable" level of unemployment and the Nixon idea will match. They have been frank in stating their fears that it is a great deal easier to turn the economy down than it will be to turn it up again and that it will be the workers who will pay the price in jobs.

Moreover, they are convinced of two things: (1) Today's inflationary push is based on excessive profits rather than excessive wages. (2) The way to fight inflation is not to slow down the economy but to produce the goods and services that people need—and want.

In the face of these fears, conservative economists are coming up with a theory of "gradualism." Henry C. Wallich, Yale economics professor and senior consultant to Treasury Sec. David Kennedy, came up with a whole speech on "gradualism" recently at a meeting of the Glass Container Manufacturers Institute.

He described "gradualism" as "the effort to taper off inflation gradually instead of at the expense of suffering a recession and high unemployment." He said that was what the Nixon Administration was trying to do and that it was working. As proof, Prof. Wallich cited the "diminishing steam in the economy," and concluded, "We can see that the brakes work."

Undoubtedly they do. But where do they stop? That is the question that is still haunting American workers. A recent cartoon summed the question up in a few words. "I have two bits of news for you," a worker tells his wife. "The good news is that I'm helping win the battle against inflation; the bad news is that I have lost my job."

"TAKE-IT-OR-LEAVE-IT"—the flat stand taken by GE—threatens the "whole concept of collective bargaining," said James D. Compton, center, steering committee chairman of the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee for General Electric and Westinghouse unions. Questioning him on Labor News Conference were Neil Gilbride, left, of the Associated Press and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine. The interview program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual Radio.

Meat Cutters File Charges In Iowa Strike

Chicago—The Meat Cutters filed unfair labor practice charges accusing Iowa Beef Packers, Inc., of forcing a strike and slandering union leaders.

The union's complaint, filed with the National Labor Relations Board, involves a dispute at an Iowa Beef plant in Dakota City, Neb., where union members have been on strike since Aug. 24.

The Meat Cutters filed a petition charging that Iowa Beef conducted a "sustained campaign of vilifying and slandering leaders of the union," circulating false propaganda among other meat packers, union members and the public; spreading "deliberate libels and slanders, including false association of the union with criminal acts including murder."

The petition also charges Iowa Beef with a "scheme and plan designed to chill unionism" at plants outside Dakota City and designed to demonstrate the futility of picking the union as their bargaining representative.

The union charged the company illegally locked out its Mason City, Iowa, workers Oct. 6; and required employes in other union-represented plants to "work in an armed camp."

The AFL-CIO convention in Atlantic City in October backed a boycott of Iowa Beef Products and put the company on the "do not patronize" list.

18,000 Ratify Settlement of Nickel Strike

Toronto, Ont.—Canadian Steelworkers stayed on strike four months to win a 93-cents-an-hour wage increase package from the International Nickel Co., one of the world's most profitable corporations, for 18,000 workers.

The settlement was the third in a row for USWA, which had 40,000 Canadian members out before the Inco agreement. Previously won were new contracts for 16,000 at Steel Co. of Canada and 6,000 at Algoma Steel Co., Sault Ste. Marie, Ont.

Two Locations

The Inco settlement was ratified in votes among 16,000 USWA members at Sudbury and 1,500 at Port Colborne, both in Ontario. They had been out since July 10.

The 32-month pact calls for average wage hikes of 88 cents an hour, plus another 5 cents an hour if prices keep rising.

Other gains include substantial improvements in pension benefits, vacations, and a major overhaul of contract language, including a guarantee against contracting-out of development work when employes are on layoff.

Inco management agreed to make full payment of premiums for hospital and medical care, drugs and health insurance.

The corporation supplies about 60 percent of the free world's supply of nickel. Its profits for the first half of 1969 were more than $80 million, a record well ahead of last year's pace, when after-tax profits totaled $143.7 million for the full year.

The firm operates mines, smelters and refining works at Sudbury, refining operations at Port Colborne, and a nickel mine at Falconbridge, Ont., where 2,000 members of the unaffiliated Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers are still on strike.

FREE LABOR in South Viet Nam is assuming increasing responsibility in the fight for freedom and against communism, Pres. Tran Quoc Buu of the Vietnamese Confederation of Labor told newsmen in Washington. He was the guest of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and federation leaders at a luncheon.

Viet Nam Unions Grow, Assume Greater Roles

munist purge, his role in founding the CVT in November 1949 and its early years of tribulation.

Looking ahead, he said the CVT is "entering a new phase of responsibility involving not just workers but the future of all of our people."

As an example of this "new responsibility," he reported that the confederation — "not satisfied with any of the existing political parties in South Viet Nam"—is laying the groundwork for a new political party.

Although preparation for the party is being made by a committee set up by CVT in 1967, Buu envisions it as a party that will embrace not only workers, but firm anti-Communist groups of farmers and Buddhist organizations.

Buu also reported that CVT has requested the International Labor Organization to undertake a survey to determine the extent to which "freedom of association" exists in North Viet Nam and report on its findings.

He indicated his own certainty of what such a survey would reveal. He said that with the partition of Viet Nam in 1954, the Communist rulers confiscated all CVT offices in North Viet Nam. In the years since, he added, all CVT leaders there have either been jailed or assassinated.

In answering questions about CVT's position in South Viet Nam, Buu said that labor leaders have been jailed in the past "but all have since been freed. There are no longer any CVT leaders in prison in South Viet Nam."

He drew a contrast between the labor situations in North and South Viet Nam, pointing out: "In South Viet Nam we have the right to strike, we can negotiate on an equal basis and we have meaningful collective bargaining contracts."

As an example of CVT's influence in South Viet Nam. Buu noted that the government there has proposed legislation for land reform—long one of the major issues advanced by the labor movement.

In answer to another question, Buu said he supports the U.S. policy of withdrawal of American troops from South Viet Nam as long as the withdrawal is "conditioned to the increasing capability of South Viet Nam's army" to take over the fighting.

Under this condition, he emphasized, the policy can have a beneficial effect in "awakening the masses" of South Viet Nam's citizens to their role in halting communism and building a strong, free government based on social progress.

Francis Lavigne Dies, Bay State Official

Brockton, Mass.—Francis E. Lavigne, director of education and research for the Massachusetts AFL-CIO, died here Nov. 8. He was 61.

Lavigne also served as president of the Brockton Central Labor Council since 1955. He had been a local and area official of the Teamsters until joining the staff of the Massachusetts Federation of Labor in 1949 as director of political education. Lavigne was named to the education and research post following the merger of the state body with the CIO.

Nixon Praises Craft Unions' Prefab Pacts

Pres. Nixon praised three AFL-CIO building trades unions for their recent agreement on the prefabrication and construction of modular housing.

He called it "an important breakthrough in our efforts to meet this country's housing crisis," and suggested that it become a model for other contracts in the building industry.

The contract was signed by the presidents of the Carpenters, the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. It provides for all-union production and erection of modular homes built by Prestige Structures, Inc., of Charlotte, Mich.

Nixon also said in his letter that he was encouraged by provisions in the pact offering training and job opportunities to meet the employment needs of minority groups.

The President's letters of congratulation were sent to Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. and the presidents of the three craft unions: M. A. Hutcheson of the Carpenters, Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters and Charles H. Pillard of the IBEW.

Prestige Structures said it plans to erect the modular houses for about $15,000 and pay top wages of $4.30 an hour to factory workers hired locally under a contract with the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development.

"This agreement will allow our society to realize the advantage of technologies without jeopardizing the legitimate interest of its laborers," Nixon said.

Task Force Cites Needs:

Wider Federal Role In Medicaid Urged

A government task force has called for a stronger, "more aggressive" federal role in administering Medicaid along with changes to improve and expand the health program for the poor.

The federal-state Medicaid system, it said in an initial report, has been frustrated by lack of manpower, "passive" federal administration and frequent fragmentation of policy.

The 27-member group, which includes doctors, business executives and educators, was established by Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Robert H. Finch in July to review Medicaid and make recommendations for improving it.

However, the duties of the task force and its area of study have since been expanded. Among other things, it is expected to report soon on the feasibility of a national health insurance system.

AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman, a member of the task force, called its first report "a good beginning" and expressed satisfaction that the group will submit additional reports in the field of health care.

The task force found "many weaknesses" in the current Medicaid program, including "callous and indifferent" treatment of the poor by dispensers of medical care.

It proposed "strong, specific and comprehensive" federal policy to assure that payments to doctors are not excessive, to control utilization of health services and to assure quality health care.

The report recommended that states be required to use a "simplified" declaration form for Medicaid applicants developed by HEW as a means of determining their eligibility.

Under current practices which vary across the country, the task force said, caseworkers visit families to question them on "things like motivation and worthiness—hardly a dignified way of helping someone."

In cases where eligibility is being determined, applicants should be certified for Medicaid while the study is going on, the report pointed out.

When a recipient of Medicaid has a complaint about his treatment, he should be given a fair hearing with representation by an attorney and assurance of appeal rights, the task force said.

In this connection, the report noted that this task force is giving further study to a proposal to offer the poor free legal services at certain Medicaid grievance hearings.

The task force urged "vigorous steps" by both the federal and state governments to make information about Medicaid more widely available, using not only English but other languages where needed.

It called for legislation to set aside 5 percent of Medicaid appropriations annually for "the development and improvement of health care services and resources."

It also asked for legislation to permit a boost in federal payments to successful state programs of 5 to 10 percent above the usual matching formula. These added funds, it suggested, would encourage states to develop programs that tie in with prepaid group practice plans, neighborhood health centers "and other arrangements for provision of comprehensive services to a defined population."

The task force warned that Medicaid is not achieving the goal set by Congress of providing "comprehensive care and services" for substantially all of the poor by 1977.

In fact, while calling for "selective improvements," the report said "serious questions exist" as to the appropriateness and ability of the present system to accomplish the stated objective.

Walter J. McNerney, president of National Blue Cross and task force chairman, said that the report "is just the first in a series" of proposals that will be submitted to Finch.

He referred to the recommendations as "short range" and "focused largely on what can be implemented essentially within the framework of the present Medicaid system."

"Let it be clear, however," he concluded, "that the task force sees many weaknesses in this framework. Fundamental changes may well prove necessary in the long run."

Labor Opposes Moves To Weaken Visa Limits

The AFL-CIO has voiced its opposition to proposals in Congress that would "weaken" the Immigration & Nationality Act's provisions dealing with admittance of aliens on temporary visas.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller testified against sections of two House bills that would remove a requirement that such aliens, defined as having "no intention of abandoning" their homelands, be admitted only for temporary jobs.

In testimony presented by Legislative Rep. Kenneth Meiklejohn to a House Judiciary subcommittee, Biemiller made it clear that his views were limited only to sections dealing with temporary visas in bills introduced by Representatives Michael A. Feighan (D-Ohio) and Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.).

These are the only sections on which the subcommittee is currently holding hearings. Should hearings be held on other provisions in the bills, Biemiller noted, the AFL-CIO would also like to present further views.

Biemiller cited previous testimony in opposition to expanding temporary visas given by Assistant Sec. of Labor Arnold Weber on behalf of the Administration.

Weber opposed the sections of the bills on grounds they would "adversely affect the wages and working conditions of U.S. workers" and "deny, often on a long-term basis, protection of the temporary alien both as a worker and potential citizen."

Also, Biemiller noted, the Dept. of Labor pointed out that enactment of the bills "could result in tremendous pressure on the department to issue thousands of certifications for low-skilled and semi-skilled aliens."

"As the agency charged with the responsibility of administering the labor certification provisions of the act," Biemiller said, "this conclusion is obviously entitled to great weight."

"We agree emphatically with Assistant Sec. Weber and strongly urged the subcommittee to reject" the sections of the bills, he said.

Lacks Federal Standards:

Jobless Benefit Bill Approved by House

improve their benefits voluntarily, was termed by the AFL-CIO "far short" of what is needed.

Labor has sought federal standards based on two-thirds of regular pay during periods of unemployment and has stressed that presidential appeals to the states to raise their benefits have not worked because of pressure from employers to keep payroll taxes down and the competition among states for new industry.

The Administration had sought inclusion of some 400,000 farm workers—employes of the largest farms. And the AFL-CIO had urged universal coverage of all workers.

The Ways & Means Committee rejected any coverage of farm workers and it set a Jan. 1, 1972 effective date for coverage of these new groups:

- About 2.6 million employes of nonprofit institutions, state hospitals and institutions of higher education.
- An estimated 750,000 workers in small establishments not now covered.
- Some 200,000 agricultural processing workers.

The extended unemployment benefits—in most cases for an additional 13 weeks after state benefits have been used up—would be financed equally by the federal government and the state.

They would go into effect on a national basis after the national unemployment rate equaled or exceeded 4.5 percent for three consecutive months. They would end after unemployment stayed below the 4.5 percent level for three months in a row.

There would also be a method by which extended benefits could be triggered in a single state even though the national unemployment rate was below the 4.5 percent level.

The employer-paid payroll tax, under the House bill, would be increased by one-tenth of 1 percent and the wage base on which it is applied would rise in 1972 from the present $3,000 to $4,200.

In taking the position that benefit standards should be left to the states, the House committee also rejected and omitted from the bill an Administration proposal to bar any state from paying benefits to workers on strike. Only two states now have such provisions, both applicable only after a long waiting period.

In other congressional developments:

- The Senate passed a bill giving the Treasury authority to make $4 billion available to help meet the shortage of mortgage money for new housing.

The bill now goes to the House. But the Administration has said that it won't make the money available even if Congress asks it to do so because it would undermine the anti-inflation policy of "monetary restraints."

- The House Rules Committee set the stage for a mischievous battle over extension of the Voting Rights Act by sending it to the floor under a procedure allowing the Administration's controversial counter-proposal to be considered as a substitute.

The civil rights coalition has sharply criticized the Administration bill which both extends the law to non-southern states with no history of prior discrimination and weakens its enforcement.

Labor and rights groups are supporting the bill approved by a bipartisan majority of the House Judiciary Committee—to extend the expiring law an additional five years. They warned that the Administration bill would be a setback to Negro voting registration in the Deep South and that the maneuver could result in lack of action on any legislation.

- The House Ways & Means Committee continued its consideration of social security benefit increase legislation and Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) said a bill should be ready for House action before the Christmas recess. All of the alternatives the committee is considering, Mills said, would raise benefits more than the 10 percent suggested by the Administration.

AFTRA Scores Attack by Agnew

The Television & Radio Artists have informed the Federal Communications Commission that the union may seek equal time to answer Vice Pres. Agnew's attack on the broadcasting industry and certain news commentators.

AFTRA Executive Sec. Sanford I. Wolff said Agnew's remarks, in which the Vice President named no individuals, amounted to a "blanket indictment of the broadcasting industry and of an entire category of AFTRA members. . . ."

In a telegram to FCC Chairman Dean Burch, Wolff said AFTRA was not requesting equal time to respond at this point but that "we do reserve the right to exercise the prerogative on behalf of the correspondents and news reporters, the working press, represented by this union."

Congress Asked to Probe Misuse of School Funds

The AFL-CIO has asked Congress to investigate charges of administrative abuses and possible misuse of funds in carrying out the Elementary & Secondary Education Act's programs to help poor children catch up educationally.

A suggestion for hearings to look into the charges was made by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller in letters to Sen. Claiborne Pell (D-R.I.) and Rep. Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.). Pell heads a Senate Education subcommittee and Perkins is chairman on the House Education & Labor Committee.

In his letters, Biemiller cited a document, labeled, "Title I of ESEA: Is It Helping Poor Children?" which recently appeared in several newspapers.

"The alleged abuses described in this report appear to be well-documented," Biemiller said. "In our judgment, they are sufficiently alarming that further investigation is warranted."

He proposed that "oversight hearings" on the law question the authors of the report, representatives of the Office of Education, state education officials, and others to determine the report's accuracy.

Imports Plan Would Ease Workers' Aid

Pres. Nixon has asked Congress to make it easier for workers and companies hurt by rising imports to qualify for government assistance.

Under the restrictive standards of the 1962 trade law, and the rigid interpretation of the U.S. Tariff Commission, it was only this month that the first groups of workers were declared eligible for benefits to compensate them for loss of jobs.

The Administration proposed that the standards be relaxed somewhat by requiring only a showing that increased imports were a "substantial cause"—rather than the "primary cause"—of the hardship. And the increase in imports would no longer have to be related to a prior tariff reduction.

It also asked Congress to put the decision on whether to grant relief to workers or companies in the hands of the President rather than the Tariff Commission. The commission's role would be limited to furnishing "factual information" to the White House.

At the same time, the President urged a continuation of the nation's policy of "freer world trade." He warned that greater curbs on imports would result in retaliation against American exports "and both sides would lose."

One change he proposed would eliminate special protection to a segment of the chemical industry. Under present laws, the tariff on benzoid chemicals is based on the selling price of the competing American products and not on the price of the imports.

In the area of easing requirements for relief from hardships resulting from freer trade, Nixon proposed a change in the "escape clause" of the 1962 law, which is supposed to bring about temporary tariff increases when an industry is adversely affected.

The President acknowledged the growth in protectionist sentiment in the United States and expressed the hope that the proposals for easing requirements for government help to workers and industries would overcome some objections to liberal trade.

He termed the problem of textile imports "a special circumstance that requires special measures," adding:

"We are now trying to persuade other countries to limit their textile shipments to the United States. In doing so, however, we are trying to work with our trading partners a reasonable solution which will allow both domestic and foreign producers to share equitably in the development of the U.S. market."

HRDI Parley Pushes Minorities Job Drive

Chicago—The challenge to organized labor in helping the nation's disadvantaged workers find good jobs at decent wages has never been greater.

This was stressed at a six-day training conference here of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute. The conference also weighed the effects that rising unemployment and changing government manpower policies will have on HRDI operations.

HRDI Pres. Julius Rothman called on the 47 manpower representatives to increase their efforts to help the working poor and minority groups.

"Our goal is to bring these disadvantaged into the economic mainstream," he declared.

He noted that the Negro community is affected most by the rising unemployment rate and this in turn increases frustration and creates more tension.

AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman cited the need for increased federal aid to cities especially for housing, jobs and better schools. He suggested that the lack of federal funds for the major urban areas is the root of the growing frustration among minority groups.

"So far, this Administration has not been willing to make available enough resources to meet the problem," he said.

Job opportunities in the inner cities will be affected by Pres. Nixon's proposed 75 percent cutback in federation construction projects, William J. McSorley, Jr., assistant to the president of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., warned the HRDI staff.

The Federal Reserve Board's tight money policy is another factor adding to the crisis in the cities, McSorley said.

Frank Pollara, assistant director of the Dept. of Research, stressed that an increase in unemployment triggered by an economic slowdown will more severely affect the hard-to-employ—those that HRDI hopes to help the most.

Progress in helping the disadvantaged is only possible when there is economic growth, Pollara observed. "There is nothing worse than training a man for a job that isn't there."

The government's program for aiding the hard-to-employ worker was outlined by John L. Blake, deputy manpower administrator in the Labor Dept. He said the department is attempting to streamline existing manpower programs in an effort to create "unity out of multiplicity."

P. L. Siemiller, the federation's liaison representative with the National Alliance of Businessmen, called for greater cooperation between labor and the NAB in helping achieve the goal of hiring 338,000 hardcore unemployed workers by June 1971.

The HRDI staff also analyzed the employment problems and manpower crisis in the specific areas covered by the 47 representatives.

Among other conference speakers were Merlin Taylor, HRDI executive director; Ernest Green of the Workers Defense League; Charles Muntain of the Housing & Urban Development Dept., and Robert McGlotten of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights.

OCAW Wins Recognition in 5 More Units

Denver—Organization of the Chicago plant of the Maybelle Co. by the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers brought to five the OCAW's recent organizing successes.

Maybelline recognized the OCAW as bargaining agent for some 246 employes. Also it agreed to recognition of the union at another Chicago plant now under construction, with a union shop at both plants.

OCAW also was chosen by employes of other firms in four National Labor Relations Board elections. Employes of Troy Industries at Elizabethton, Tenn., voted 99-60 for OCAW; Equitable Gas pipeline employes in Pennsylvania and West Virginia picked OCAW, 107-89; in Rockwood, Mich., Calgon-Merck chemical workers cast 80 votes for OCAW, 48 for District 50, unaffiliated; at Houston, Tex., OCAW ousted a 27-year-old "independent" union, 205-134, at United Gas.

Earlier OCAW Local 4-367 won a 30-month contract after striking for six months against the Rohm & Haas Co. in Pasadena, Tex. Some 600 employes got raises of more than 68 cents an hour and other benefits, including cash vacation bonuses.

For Family of Four:

Poverty Panel Asks $2,400 Income Base

Administration's program pushed for expansion of day care facilities and the commission did not.

The Administration proposals would call for expenditure of about $6 billion per year and would be designed to reach 22 million people. The commission's program would cost an estimated $7 billion and would provide payments to 36 million.

The difference stems from income supplements to persons with other income. Under the commission proposal, all incomes below $4,800 a year would be eligible for supplements. The Administration would have a cutoff of $3,820 a year from all sources.

Pres. Nixon's welfare reform package is under consideration by the House Ways & Means Committee. The President is under no obligation to accept any recommendations of the commission.

The commission's report stressed that its findings were only a starting point, and commission chairman Ben Heineman, president of Northwest Industries, estimated it would cost $27 billion to bring all Americans above the government-defined poverty level of $3,550 a year.

Sullivan, president of the Service Employes, recommended in his supplementary statement that the poverty level of $3,550 should be the base of the federal guarantee instead of $2,400.

Randolph concurred in Sullivan's statement and both concurred in a similar statement by another member, Clifford Alexander, calling for a base of $3,600 a year.

Sullivan also said the commission's report was too "arbitrary and negative" about the potential of programs other than the income supplements.

"I have in mind such things as the minimum wage program, training and employment programs and the various social insurance programs," he said, "as well as health services, housing programs and day care."

If the minimum wage were raised to $2 an hour and extended to all workers, it would raise four million people above the poverty level, Sullivan noted, and that is one-sixth of the nation's total poor.

"We have somehow gotten used to the idea of the 'working poor' in this country," Sullivan said. "These are people who work fulltime, all year, for sub-poverty wages. This is wrong and I think the commission had a duty to say that it is wrong."

Sullivan also pointed out that the $3,550 figure as the poverty level was based on 1968, and there has been a rapid increase in the cost of living since then. Even then, Sullivan said the "poverty" line is well below the $4,800 a year the Bureau of Labor Statistics says is needed by a family of four to meet the basic requirements of physical health and social well-being.

Social security was not the commission's concern, Sullivan said, but the report should have referred such questions to the Advisory Council on Social Security instead of making "rather off-hand recommendations for elimination of dependents' allowances, minimum benefits and similar features."

The commission's concern with the cost of day care facilities caused a lukewarm position in the final report and this stirred a dissenting statement from commission member Margaret S. Gordon of the University of California.

FIRST WINNER of a Communications Workers "Hi-Mom" call during the coming holidays is drawn by Mrs. Richard Nixon in the White House library. Assisting the First Lady at the drawing are Josephine T. Keefer, chairman of the program for the CWA City Council that includes all locals in the Washington, D.C., area, and G. Frederick Stanton, president of the National Capital USO. The winner was Army Spec. 4 Howard R. Wallace, of Sumner, Md., who is serving in South Viet Nam. The CWA will arrange about 3,000 "Hi-Mom" calls this year between servicemen overseas and their families.

Deactivation Of Government Ships Pressed

The AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. charged that the operation of government-owned ships by the Dept. of Defense constituted "unfair, unwise and unwarranted competition" with the privately-owned merchant marine.

In a statement filed with the House Merchant Marine & Fisheries Committee, the MTD called for the deactivation of all ships which had been taken out of the reserve fleet to back up merchant vessels on the Viet Nam sealift.

The MTD expressed its support for a bill introduced by Rep. Edward A. Garmatz (D-Md.), committee chairman, which would require the use of privately-owned American-flag vessels, in preference to government-owned vessels, for the carriage of government-sponsored cargo.

"The Vietnamese shipping crisis is now over," the MTD statement said. "The winding down of the war has reduced the demand for emergency shipping. In fact, the demand has been so reduced that privately-owned merchant ships are going into lay-up—and their crews are being put on the beach—because of a lack of cargo."

"And yet many of the ships from the reserve fleet remain in service today, carrying government cargo that by rights should be moving on privately-owned ships. . . ."

Some of the ships have been returned to mothballs, the statement noted. But, the MTD said, 45 are still in operation and "even one government-owned ship in competition with our privately-owned fleet is one too many."

Senate Showdown Set On Judge Haynsworth

B. Everett Jordan—told his colleagues about the heavy pressure initiated from the White House.

Jordan hadn't announced his position, but he sent a courteous letter to the attorney general informing him that he "could not in good conscience vote to confirm Judge Haynsworth."

Jordan reported to the Senate that "since that date, Administration calls to my state have been legion." Friends who lacked the information on which to make an independent judgment "have been persuaded to call me," Jordan said. And "support of the President is urged as if it were a personal matter rather than an issue of grave constitutional importance."

He will vote against the nomination, Jordan said, "with a heavy heart, but with a clear conscience."

Haynsworth supporters took heart when Sen. Ralph T. Smith (R-Ill.), who six weeks earlier had opposed confirmation, announced that he had changed his mind. "I agree with Pres. Nixon," Smith said, "that the voice of conservatism has a right to be heard in our Supreme Court."

Several other senators who had not previously announced their position said they had decided to vote for confirmation.

But if the intent was to start a bandwagon effect, it was halted when Sen. John J. Williams (R-Del.) took the floor.

Besides having unimpeachable conservative credentials, Williams had the reputation of being the conscience of the Senate. Not that the Senate always followed his rigid code of ethics, but it held him in respect.

If Williams could support the nomination, the speculation went, several other senators could be persuaded to overcome their doubts about Haynsworth's conflict of interest pattern.

"There is nothing wrong with a man making a profit on his business operations," Williams noted. "But does such a business operation coincide with the canons of judicial ethics to which Judge Haynsworth subscribed when he assumed office?"

Question Asked

He called on each senator to consider: "Did Haynsworth disassociate himself from outside financial transaction in a manner expected of a federal judge and, if confirmed, would he add dignity and help restore respect for our court?"

For himself, Williams gave the answer, "I shall vote against his confirmation."

Sen. Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.) charged that Haynsworth's judicial record on labor and civil rights cases "reveals his inability to surmount the preconceptions which he brought to the bench."

The record, he said, demonstrates the judge's "anti-labor bias" and "a continuing refusal to follow either the spirit or the letter of the Supreme Court's decision" in 1954 outlawing school desegregation.

And from his home city of Greenville, S.C., a friend of Haynsworth told newsmen that the judge remains "frankly puzzled" by the controversy over his nomination.

Labor Dept. Denies Plan To Set Low Youth Wage

Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz has denied published reports that the Labor Dept. is considering a plan for a special youth wage below the Wage-Hour law's $1.60 an hour minimum.

His denial—and firm opposition to any such scheme—came in answering a letter from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who had expressed concern about the idea, calling it "unbelievable."

The subject came to the fore on Nov. 6 when Sec. of Commerce Maurice H. Stans said the Administration was considering a minimum of "about $1.20 or $1.25 an hour" for youths under 21 to cut unemployment and bring them into the work force.

Stans, enthusiastic about the plan, went on to say that Shultz was studying the proposal preparatory to reporting on it to the Cabinet.

Conceding that some employers might tend to replace adult workers with youths at cut-rate wages, Stans said, "There's nothing wrong with that."

He suggested the plan would receive wide support from everyone except labor leaders "who don't like the idea of a break in the dike" on wage scales.

After that Meany wrote Shultz:

"We are concerned by recent newspaper reports that the Dept. of Labor is studying a proposal to reduce the statutory minimum wage for teenagers from $1.60 to $1.25 an hour and apply this rate to all below the age of 21.

"Would you please advise me of the facts about this report? I frankly find it unbelievable."

Shultz's reply read:

"The only study going on around here, relevant to your question about a possible youth wage, is one to determine to what extent, if at all, the minimum wage is responsible for the high rates of unemployment among youth.

"I have made no policy decision to recommend a youth wage at all, and I would oppose any youth wage figure below the existing statutory minimum of $1.60 an hour for all persons in covered industries."

Draft Lottery System Cleared by Congress

Next year's typical draftee will be 19 years old. He will be chosen from among other young men that age by a random selection process—sometimes called a lottery.

Congress completed action on the one-sentence draft law change sought by the Administration, eliminating a sentence which prohibits use of a lottery system to determine the order of callup.

Pres. Nixon has said that he will issue an Executive Order placing 19-year-olds in a pool of maximum vulnerability for one year. This would remove much of the career uncertainty facing men who now are subject to be called up anytime between the ages of 18½ and 26.

The proposed lottery system would be based on birthdays. The days of the year would be drawn at random, and those whose birthdays fell on the dates pulled first would be most likely to be called to service.

While the new system is being phased in, however, older men will continue to be liable for callups.

The Senate acted by voice vote after its Armed Services Committee promised to hold hearings in February on proposals for more basic reforms of the draft system. The legislation sent for the President's signature does not deal with deferments or any other phase of the selective service system.

August Bellanca Dies, Clothing Union Pioneer

New York—Former Vice Pres. August Bellanca of the Clothing Workers died at 86. He was one of the founders of the union.

He was a vice president of the ACWA in three separate periods—from 1916 to 1934, from 1946 to 1948 and from 1952 until his retirement in 1966.

Bellanca became a union organizer in 1910 and participated in the founding of the ACWA in 1914. Born in Italy, Bellanca also served as an unofficial representative of the American labor movement to the Italian government for a number of years.

Teachers Win Newark Unit From NEA

Newark, N.J.—The National Education Association lost its last big-city stronghold on the East Coast when the Newark Teachers Association, an NEA affiliate, was defeated in a representation election by the Newark Teachers Union, affiliated with the AFL-CIO Teachers.

The vote, conducted by the state Labor Relations Board, was 2,020 for the union, 571 for the association, and 428 for another unaffiliated group. There were 13 votes for no bargaining agent.

The association had represented Newark educators for three years. Other NEA affiliates that have lost to the AFT in recent years include those in Boston, Providence, Hartford, New Haven and New York City.

On the West Coast, San Francisco teachers will vote Nov. 25 for the AFT or the unaffiliated Teachers Association, with space for a write-in of the NEA affiliate. The latter asked that its name be removed from the ballot.

Unions Launch GE Boycott, Company Ignores New Bid

Nixon Seeks Conservative For Court

By David L. Perlman

The White House and the Justice Dept. began a new search for a conservative judge to give "balance" to the Supreme Court in the wake of the Senate's decisive 55-45 rejection of the nomination of Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr.

Pres. Nixon, expressing regret at the turndown of Haynsworth, said he will wait until the second session of Congress convenes in January before submitting a new name.

Meanwhile the Supreme Court will continue to operate with eight members. The ninth seat has been empty since last May when Abe Fortas resigned after conflict of interest allegations which—in his words—threatened to "adversely affect the work and position of the court."

The Fortas episode was one of the factors that prompted senators to undertake an in-depth probe of Haynsworth's business and financial activities during his tenure as a judge. The other key factor was the early, determined opposition of labor and civil rights groups based on Haynsworth's decisions as an appellate court judge.

Even before the nomination was formally submitted last August—when it was known that Haynsworth was under consideration—AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and the Civil Rights Leadership Conference privately urged the President not to nominate a judge whose opinions showed hostility to unions and to civil rights enforcement.

Not only had key Haynsworth decisions in these areas been re-

SPECIAL CONVENTION of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers hears AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany pledge full labor backing in strike of 150,000 General Electric Co. workers. But "the real responsibility is yours to keep these pickets on the line," Meany stressed. The convention voted one hour's pay a week for the duration of the strike of IUE and 12 other unions, and promised to "carry on this fight until victory is ours."

'Don't Buy' Call Issued By Meany

The AFL-CIO launched a nationwide boycott of all General Electric Co. products on Nov. 28 after the struck firm ignored an appeal by Federation Pres. George Meany to drop its take-it-or-leave-it approach and engage in good-faith collective bargaining.

Notice of the boycott was given by Meany in a letter to the heads of all affiliated union bodies and a public statement. (Text, Page 4.)

"The success of this action," Meany said, "depends upon the whole-hearted cooperation of every union member and his family, friends and neighbors.

"I call on you to rally your entire membership to help the GE strikers by mobilizing their purchasing power on behalf of decent union contracts."

The "Don't Buy GE" campaign was the latest major development in the dispute with the world's largest and most profitable electrical manufacturer. The walkout by 150,000 members of 13 unions began Oct. 27 when GE refused to budge from the one flat offer it made to the coordinated unions Oct. 7—a technique ruled unlawful by the 2nd U.S. Court of Appeals.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council quickly established a strike relief fund with a $50,000 donation and called on every union member to donate at least $1 apiece to the fund.

Real Earnings Continue Lag For 9th Month

The buying power of workers' paychecks—their "real spendable earnings"—was below year ago levels for the ninth consecutive month in October as the cost of living continued to soar higher, the Labor Dept. reported.

A four-tenths of 1 percent jump in living costs sent the Consumer Price Index to 129.8. It thus cost $12.98 in October to buy goods and services that cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period.

The October rise was smaller than the five-tenths of 1 percent increase in September and a similar one in July, but identical to the increase in August.

New Relief Proposed:

Senate Starts Action On Tax Reform Bill

Tax relief for low and middle-income Americans will be the big issue before the Senate when Congress returns from a long Thanksgiving weekend.

During three days of debate before the recess, the Senate voted down a series of amendments to the tax reform bill drafted by its Finance Committee. But with more than one-third of the members absent on the rollcalls, it put off voting on additional amendments.

Up for action will be proposals by Senators Albert Gore (D-Tenn.) and Vance Hartke (D-Ind.) to raise the personal exemption above the present $600 for each taxpayer and dependent.

The higher personal exemptions —to $1,000 in the principal Gore amendment — would be accompanied by an increase in the minimum standard deduction, the amount taxpayers who do not itemize deductions can subtract from their taxable income. This would provide additional tax relief for the poor, for single persons, married couples without children and others whose itemized deductions are small. Larger families would benefit substantially from the higher personal exemptions.

The AFL-CIO had initially proposed an alternative means of achieving substantial tax reductions for those of low and middle incomes—based on rate changes in the lower income brackets. But the federation is backing the Gore proposal as superior to the committee bill which, the AFL-CIO said,, "gives a disproportionate percentage of tax reduction to those in the high-income brackets."

Gore's amendment is opposed by the Administration, but it has strong support in the House, where tax legislation was acted on under a no-amendment rule.

Job Safety Legislation Pressed in Congress

The mounting toll of deaths, injuries, disease and human suffering in the workplace can only be abated by enactment of a strong occupational health and safety law, the AFL-CIO urged Congress.

Any further delay in passage of such legislation is "intolerable," Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told a Senate Labor subcommittee. He called for passage of legislation based on a bill introduced by Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.).

The same point was made by representatives of the Steelworkers; Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, and Service Employes before a House Labor subcommittee.

They gave the lawmakers a clear picture of hazards to safety and health in plants all across the nation and numerous examples of employers refusing to do anything about the situation.

Testimony on the House side, where Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) has introduced a companion bill to the Williams measure, came from IUE Pres. Paul Jennings; Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Burke of the Steelworkers; Anthony Mazzocchi, OCAW legislative director; and

Strike Support Rallies Push GE Fund Drive

By Eugene A. Kelly

Organized labor rolled up its sleeves across the country to raise $1 million a week or more for 150,000 strikers walking General Electric Co. picket lines.

"We are launching a campaign that is without precedent in the history of American labor," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a New York City labor rally, one of 23 assemblies called to set the machinery in motion for a fund-raising and fact-disseminating campaign among 13.5 million American union members. (Photos, Page 6.)

The strike, involving 10 unions in the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee and three unaffiliated unions, is a "throwback to something we saw in the early days" of the labor movement. Meany said in spearheading labor's drive to line up every union member behind the strikers.

Recalling that "practically every strike was for recognition of the union" back at the turn of the century, Meany said "we have come a long way" since the right to organize was established by law—the Wagner Act.

It may be difficult to believe, but it is true, he said, that "here in 1969 we are still facing this same problem" of union recognition with "one of the largest corporations in America."

"This strike," Meany declared, "is a strike for the right to have a

Musicians End 6-Week Strike In Washington

A strike that had silenced the Washington National Symphony for six weeks ended but not on a completely happy note for Musician's Local 161-170 even though its members scored some gains.

The local's members, by a 55-25 vote, approved an offer that union negotiators said was accepted only under the threat of the National Symphony Association to close the entire symphony season.

As one negotiator put it, "We were faced with the alternative of losing our wages for a year or accepting an improved but still inadequate management offer."

Under a new three-year contract, symphony players will get a minimum wage of $220 a week immediately, going to $235 in the second year, $255 in the third year. The local wanted a $250 minimum in a two-year pact.

The players, who have been working 45 weeks a year, will get 46 weeks now, 47 weeks in the second year, 50 weeks in the third year. They sought year-around employment.

The contract also calls for improvements in per diem expenses, vacations, pensions and health care, and a reduced work load. In most of these areas the gains also were less than sought.

Following settlement of the dispute, management said it would seek increased financial support for the orchestra from the federal government and the community. If funds are forthcoming, the union said, it expects further improvement in wages and benefits.

Nixon Urged To Name Panel On Fire Safety

The Fire Fighters launched a new effort to seek implementation of the two-year-old Fire Research & Safety Act by asking Pres. Nixon to appoint the 20-member National Commission on Fire Prevention & Control set up by the act.

At the same time, the IAFF called on the nation's governors and mayors of major cities to help get action from the Administration.

The IAFF was a moving force in passage of the act in 1968. It authorizes federal support of programs for the prevention and control of fires. It provides for appointment of the national commission as a means of winning broad public support for fire safety programs.

IAFF Pres. William H. McClennan wrote Nixon reminding him of his previous support of the act and urging action to carry out its provisions. McClennan said:

"With the need for fire safety programs growing daily, we feel it is imperative that the commission be appointed and start work as soon as possible."

Labor Contributes $10,000 to CARE

A $10,000 grant from labor to CARE to be used by the international relief organization for food, medicine and education in developing nations has been announced by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

The amount represents the latest total in voluntary contributions from affiliated unions, state federations and city central bodies. It was raised under the leadership of AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Lee W. Minton, who is a CARE vice president representing the federation.

Screen Actors Win TV Commercial Pact

Hollywood, Calif.—The Screen Actors Guild has negotiated a new three-year contract with increases of more than 15 percent for actors in television commercials, the guild announced at its annual meeting here.

More than 1,000 members attended the meeting at which SAG presented its annual award for "outstanding achievement" in acting to Edward G. Robinson, a founding member of the Guild and an actor for more than 60 years.

Pres. Charlton Heston was installed for a new term after winning re-election in a mail ballot by a vote of 5,077 to 1,444 for David Greene.

SAG Executive Sec. John L. Dales announced that the new contract, negotiated jointly with the Television & Radio Artists, will be submitted for a vote of SAG members by mail.

It provides increases like the following in TV commercial rates:

- From $120 to $136 a day for camera first use on Class A program commercials; off camera, from $90 to $102; for succeeding uses, from $83 on 2nd use down to $22 for 27th and later uses.
- From 5 percent to 6.5 percent in pension and welfare contributions by employers.

Other improvements, Dales said, include pay of $50 an hour for improvising commercials, fixed fees for tours and personal appearances, individual contracts to be completed and delivered to the player before he begins work.

Treas. Gilbert Perkins reported a rise of nearly $100,000 in Guild surplus funds. During the past year SAG collected $1.5 million for 2,985 members in claims filed against film producers, he said.

Heston told the meeting that Hollywood unions and studios have retained former Sen. Thomas Kuchel to represent them in seeking legislation to encourage more film production in this country instead of overseas. Allied in the program are SAG, the Hollywood Film Council, Inc., and management.

Robinson, the annual award winner, has appeared in more than 100 motion pictures and 40 Broadway plays, and still is active in his profession and union. In 1933, he donated $1,000 to help organize the Guild, along with a few other actors.

The meeting re-elected Vice Presidents Whit Bissell and Ricardo Montalban, and Perkins. New officers are Vice Presidents John Gavin and Joyce Gordon and Recording Sec. Kathleen Freeman.

After Haynsworth Defeat:

White House Looks For Another Justice

versed by the Supreme Court, but one case — in which Haynsworth upheld the union-busting tactics of the Deering-Milliken textile chain—posed the conflict of interest issue that was to become a decisive factor in the confirmation battle.

With a long list of opposition witnesses asking to testify against the nomination, with interested senators preparing a searching questioning of Haynsworth, there was no longer any possibility that the nomination would be routinely approved.

But few observers—at that stage—thought that it would be defeated. Only once before in this century, during the Hoover Administration, had the Senate rejected outright a Supreme Court nomination.

At the Senate hearings, Meany stressed that the AFL-CIO did not lightly decide to oppose the nomination and acknowledged the right of the President to appoint a man of his own viewpoint. But, he insisted and the Senate subsequently agreed, that Haynsworth's "record proves him unfit to sit on the Supreme Court."

Day by day, the documentation emerged to demolish the bland assurances given at the start of the hearings. Both the letter and spirit of judicial canons of ethics had clearly been violated. Arguments that little in the way of personal gain could come to Haynsworth as the result of his decisions were in the end rejected by an impressive number of Republicans as well as most Democrats.

While 38 of the Senate's 57 Democrats voted against confirmation, it was the votes of 17 Republicans that sealed the defeat.

Senate Republican Leader Hugh Scott ended up voting against the nomination and his assistant leader, Sen. Robert P. Griffin (R-Mich.) actively rounded up GOP votes against confirmation.

Three of the Senate's most prestigious Republicans — John Sherman Cooper of Kentucky, Margaret Chase Smith of Maine and John J. Williams of Delaware—found the Haynsworth nomination unacceptable.

On the Democratic side, Sen. Birch Bayh of Indiana put together the documented evidence of conflict of interest cases and evasive or contradictory statements by Haynsworth.

It was this evidence—particularly the South Carolina judge's active role in a vending machine company doing major business with the Deering-Milliken textile firm and his purchase of stock in a company with a case before his court—that was most frequently cited by opponents of the nomination.

From a political viewpoint, most observers viewed the nomination as another installment in the Administration's "southern strategy" which has made Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.), the former Dixiecrat candidate for President, a major influence in government.

In the post-mortems on the defeat of the nomination, supporters as well as opponents were critical of what they described as heavy-handed White House pressure to get senators to support Haynsworth.

Sen. Ernest F. Hollings (D) from Haynsworth's home state of South Carolina charged that the White House had needlessly antagonized senators through inept lobbying.

"I'd get somebody else to get votes around the Senate than Clark Mollenhoff," Hollings said, referring to the former newsman on the White House staff who aggressively pushed the Haynsworth drive.

Sen. Mark O. Hatfield (R-Ore.) said he had been threatened with primary opposition by a "conservative, politically powerful" group if he voted against confirmation. Sen. William B. Saxbe (R-Ohio) reported "heavy-handed" pressure from party contributors. Both nevertheless voted against confirmation.

Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell, who recommended Haynsworth to the President, said the background of the Fortas episode was a factor in the defeat of the nomination.

As for opposition by unions, Mitchell commented: "I presumed they would not be overjoyed" with the nomination, "but I didn't think they would mount such a nationwide campaign against him."

Sen. Roman H. Hruska (R-Neb.), the floor leader for the Haynsworth supporters, contended that the rejection of the nomination was based on "ideology and philosophy" rather than judicial ethics.

The judge said he will decide by early December whether to remain on the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals or return to private life.

He expressed the hope that the debate over his nomination "will prove to have been a cleansing agent which will smooth the way for the President's next and later nominees."

Rollcall Vote in Senate On Judge Haynsworth

The Senate on Nov. 21 voted 55-45 to reject the nomination of Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., to be a justice of the Supreme Court. Labor strongly supported the position of the 38 Democrats and 17 Republicans who voted against confirmation. Voting for confirmation of Haynsworth were 26 Republicans and 19 Democrats.

Labor Rolls Up Its Sleeves:

Coast-to-Coast Rallies Push All-Out Support for Strikers

union. It will have far-reaching effects, far beyond its effect on the workers" immediately concerned.

"In a sense, it is a challenge to the American labor movement.

"I am completely convinced that American labor is ready to meet this challenge."

Federation Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland addressed a Seattle rally, and AFL-CIO vice presidents who are members of the Executive Council spoke at labor meetings in cities from coast to coast.

At the Boston rally, Longshoremen's Pres. Thomas W. Gleason told representatives of 600,000 area trade unionists that ILA members will neither "load nor discharge" GE products until the strike is settled.

The basic message of the rally speakers was the same—tell the story of the strike to all your members, ask for a donation of at least $1, back the strikers on the picket line, spread the message in handbills and bumper stickers.

Funds to support the strikers are starting to come in but more will be needed, speakers reported. They noted that one of the striking unions alone—the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers—paid out nearly $3 million in the first three weeks of the walkout. The IUE voted in special convention to put one hour's pay per non-striking worker per week into the strike support fund.

At the rally of nearly 1,000 union representatives from the New York area, the United Federation of Teachers announced an initial contribution of $10,000 and an additional pledge of $50,000 to the support fund.

Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob Potofsky reported a first contribution of $26,000, with more to come in voluntary dollar donations. The State AFL-CIO, the Service Employes and the State, County & Municipal Employes were among others putting their money on the line for the strikers, and Bayard Rustin announced formation of an area-wide citizens' committee by the A. Philip Randolph Institute and the League for Industrial Democracy.

Highlights of other rallies:

BALTIMORE—Machinists Pres. Floyd E. Smith told 500 area labor leaders that labor will win economic justice at GE "if it takes all winter."

The struggle of the strikers "is our struggle; their hunger is our hunger; their defeat would be our defeat," he said.

Baltimore AFL-CIO Council Pres. Dominic Fornaro called for an area information campaign "so shoppers and consumers all over Maryland will know what kind of an anti-union outfit GE is."

BIRMINGHAM — Pres. Max Greenberg of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union told 300 Alabama unionists the GE strike is "one of the most crucial" in U.S. labor history. He asked generous support of "union members who have picked up the gauntlet thrown down by this strikebreaking company."

CHICAGO—Labor once "passed the hat" for strike contributions but a more efficient approach has been called for by the AFL-CIO, Sec. Joseph Keenan of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers told area leaders. He said GE has forced its union members to strike and thus has made a "frontal attack" not only on collective bargaining but also on the union coalition formed to coordinate GE bargaining.

CLEVELAND—GE posing as an inflation fighter "is like Bonnie and Clyde posing as bank guards," Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel observed at a rally of 300 unionists. He noted GE's role in fixing prices in a 1960 antitrust conviction and its "arrogant disregard of the labor law."

Unless organized labor wins a fair contract, other powerful firms will ape GE, said Abel. He called on Ohioans to raise the money needed to win the strike.

Abel stressed the stake of the general public in the strike. He said that if unions are made ineffective by GE tactics, labor's ability to promote the general welfare also is imperiled.

Cleveland AFL-CIO Pres. P. J. O'Malley pledged complete support for the strikers from 150,000 area union members. So did Pres. Frank W. King of the Ohio AFL-CIO.

DETROIT—Widespread support was pledged to GE strikers at a rally of 300 Detroit-area delegates who heard Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes emphasize that a victory for GE workers will mean a victory for all U.S. workers.

Wurf reported GE has long used the existence of 13 separate employe unions to "divide and conquer" but now faces a united front of unions solidly backed by all labor. He said GE hopes a long strike will "starve the workers into taking whatever GE wants to give them." To forestall this, he asked for donations of at least $1 million a week for the strikers.

HOUSTON—Pres. A. F. Grospiron of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers told 215 area leaders that "this strike is not just a fight involving the 13 unions which are out, but it's your fight too. This is the battleground. Let's make it a hot one."

Council officers outlined a program to collect donations for strikers, and Seafarers Vice Pres. Frank Drozak invited area strikers and their families "to have Thanksgiving dinner with us" at SIU hall.

KANSAS CITY—Iron Workers Pres. John H. Lyons told a gathering of 150 unionists that the strength of existing federal laws and the solidarity of labor are being tested in the nationwide GE strike.

"We are confronted by a monster—the fourth largest corporate power in America," Lyons said. "In most towns, GE is the largest, often the only big employer. It dominates the economy."

The Iron Workers, with no members at GE, have donated $15,000 to the strike fund, he announced.

MEMPHIS — Organizing Dir. Edward J. Carlough of the Sheet Metal Workers told members of area unions "all GE understands is power and money. Don't preach to them—it won't do any good. But don't kneel to them. Back the strikers by withholding our buying power, and back them with money, because this is our fight as well as theirs."

Carlough took the place of Painters Pres. S. Frank Raftery, absent because of illness in the family. Carlough said GE has a profit rate 50 percent higher than the industry average, but doesn't plead inability to pay—"it just says that's all you're going to get."

MILWAUKEE — Transport Workers Pres. Matthew Guinan spoke at a packed rally in Steelworkers' hall and at plant gates where GE pickets walked in the first blizzard of the season.

Local leaders voted unanimously to join the strike-support movement after Guinan said GE strikers are "fighting the most reactionary and anti-labor management in the country."

NEW ORLEANS—GE's slogan, Progress Is Our Most Important Product, should be changed to Profit Is Our Most Important Product, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Max Greenberg informed a strike rally of Louisiana and Mississippi union officers. He described GE's "special kind of labor relations"—a single take-it-or-leave-it contract offer, and a massive "sales" campaign to bypass the employe's union.

Greenberg said that GE, despite a profit of 15 percent against an average of 11 percent in industry, "still plays the role of the grasping employer, paying an average of only $1.81 an hour . . . one of the lowest in the business."

PITTSBURGH — A unanimous resolution supporting the coordinated union approach to bargaining with GE was adopted by 200 unionists after a report on strike issues by Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway, Airline & Steamship Clerks. The GE strike "involves all of labor and must be won with the united support of all union members," Dennis declared.

He announced that his union has contributed $25,000 to the strike fund and has called on its 150 general chairmen and 1,600 lodge chairmen to help raise funds locally.

PORTLAND, ORE.—GE's current posture "challenges the legal concept of free collective bargaining," AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher said. Awareness of this, he said, has produced more total involvement by labor than ever before.

ST. LOUIS—More than 350 labor council delegates applauded an appeal by Wurf for support of the GE strikers. Wurf said a minimum of $1 million is needed for strike support each week and "as the strike goes on the need will increase.

"We cannot win," he said, "unless we get help from local unions and central bodies all over the land." The strike may be a long one, he warned.

ST. PAUL — Union delegates promised strong backing for GE strikers at a leadership rally addressed by Kircher. He told how GE persists in its "one fair and firm offer" theory of bargaining in spite of a federal Appeals Court ruling to the contrary. There is, Kircher said, only one language that managements like GE understand—that of trade union unity.

Labor plans include mass meetings throughout Minnesota, leafleting at plant gates, and formation of strike support and boycott committees in all local unions.

SEATTLE—More than 350 unionists crowded the Labor Temple on a rainy night to pledge their support for the strike. They heard Kirkland describe GE's one contract offer to its unions as "absurdly and provocatively low." As another example of GE penny-pinching, Kirkland said GE offers two days of paid sick leave after five years of service.

"This strike is part of a bigger issue," Kirkland said. "It is a conspiracy to hang the blame for inflation on labor. This is an effort to perpetrate a mammoth fraud on the nation."

He urged area leaders to "give your complete support to the GE strikers."

Labor Mobilizes Boycott Against All GE Products

strike-support campaign was assured at 23 meetings addressed by AFL-CIO local leaders in cities across the country, Nov. 17-20.

There were these other developments:

- Delegates to a special convention of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers voted to ask 240,000 non-striking members to donate "no less than one hour's pay a week" for the duration of the strike at GE, where 90,000 IUE members are walking picket lines.
- Delegates from IUE's Westinghouse unions pledged to double that amount in contributions while a contract extension keeps 40,000 members on their jobs.
- The convention voted to ask the National Labor Relations Board to seek a federal court injunction compelling GE to engage in "genuine collective bargaining" and to stop using the unlawful system developed by Lemuel Boulware, former GE official.
- The Longshoremen announced that ILA members will not load or unload GE supplies at any U.S. port while the strike continues.

Meany assured the IUE convention that "GE is not going to have its way on this issue" of defying the law and refusing to recognize unions as representatives of GE employes.

A few days later GE met with IUE negotiators who reported no company movement at all toward a settlement.

In one of a series of advertisements, the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee charged the strike of employes was caused by GE policy and "has lasted this long because GE refuses to budge from an arbitrary position."

"The strike will end," the committee said, "when GE shows it is ready to obey the law and bargain in good faith with the unions its employes have chosen.

"Then and only then will this strike be over."

Meany, in announcing the GE boycott, called on unions and central bodies to take the following steps:

- Inform every union member immediately about the boycott and the necessity for it. Spread the message "Don't Buy GE" by every possible means—at meetings, handbilling at plant gates, bulletin board notices and public statements.
- Prepare handbills directed to consumers; give materials on the "proper techniques for consumer picketing" to experienced picket captains and distribute them at shopping centers and stores selling GE products.
- Establish informational picket lines at all retail stores featuring GE and Hotpoint brands.

Meany urged that Senior Citizen and Women's Auxiliaries groups be asked to staff the informational picket lines during peak shopping hours, especially during the day when union members are at work.

Retailers should be informed of the boycott, urged to stop selling GE products, and allocate advertising and promotion to products of other manufacturers, Meany asked.

"We do not want to hurt retail sales. We want consumers to purchase what they need but not to buy GE products," he said.

He advised also that purchasing agents at every level of government should be urged to halt all buying of GE products "from light bulbs to generators." Building trades unions should urge builders and contractors to install non-GE appliances in new buildings, and local advertising should be used widely—newspapers, radio and television stations and billboards.

In a parallel development, the NLRB found GE guilty of refusal to bargain at its Warren, O., lamp plant and ordered it to permit an IUE time study expert to check an employe grievance. It was the latest in a long series of findings of illegal GE practices.

Farm Workers Offer Calendar

The United Farm Workers calendar for 1970 isn't for sale.

It's a Christmas gift—to and from supporters of the grape boycott. Its designer is an Ohio priest, the Rev. John Bank, whose on-the-scene photographs illustrate the calendar.

The United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, P.O. Box 130, Delano, Calif., 93215, is sending a calendar to each person who donates $1 to help the grape boycott.

Turn Off GE

IT IS WITH GREAT RELUCTANCE but complete determination that we announce that a consumer boycott will begin next Friday morning (Nov. 28) against all General Electric products unless a satisfactory settlement of the strike has been reached by that time.

American workers don't like to boycott. They like to produce and purchase.

So we have waited in the vain hope that General Electric would bargain in good faith. The company still has time to negotiate in the American tradition of fair play.

But if GE continues its arrogant take-it-or-leave-it attitude, we will have no recourse but to urge customers throughout the country to refuse to buy any product that bears a GE label.

In its full-page ads, GE says it deplores boycotts. Of course, GE also advertises that it opposes inflation at the very time it is raising prices, so we never know when a GE ad is telling the truth.

If it means what it says, GE can avert this boycott. Because if the boycott takes place, it will be because GE forced it, just as GE forced its workers to strike.

TOMORROW WE WILL mail to every affiliated union, state and city central body and directly affiliated local union of the AFL-CIO instructions on the proper techniques for consumer picketing. We will urge them to mobilize all of their locals and subordinate bodies to make this boycott as complete as possible. We will specifically ask that they mobilize their Senior Citizen organizations to help.

In addition, we have been promised the complete cooperation of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. and its local affiliates and of the AFL-CIO Women's Auxiliaries and its local affiliates.

We intend to put informational picket lines in front of consumer outlets featuring GE products, to handbill customers in shopping centers, to use billboards and other media to urge union members, their families, friends and neighbors to refuse to buy GE products.

We will ask our state and city leaders to meet with all government purchasing agents in their localities urging an immediate halt to the purchase of any GE product, from a light bulb to a generator, until GE reaches a satisfactory settlement with its workers.

Let me repeat: We hope there will be an immediate end to the strike so that there will be no necessity of a boycott. But if GE refuses, then we will boycott everything that bears a GE label every place in this country for as long as it takes to get a contract.

—Statement by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany issued Nov. 24, 1969.

No Conflict

THE ADMINISTRATION has urged the Senate not to cut taxes too deeply because the revenue loss to the government might add to inflationary pressures.

There's a simple solution. Neither the House-passed tax bill nor the Senate Finance Committee's bill goes more than half-way towards closing the loopholes that allow wealthy individuals and corporations to escape taxation.

By doing a better job in plugging these holes, Congress would be able to provide needed tax relief for the average person, with enough money left over to fund the programs the nation so urgently needs.

A Word Edgewise:

'Product' Packaging of News Real Issue at TV Networks

By John P. Roche

THE CONTROVERSY between Vice Pres. Agnew and the TV barons may well go on forever. Agnew's problem is that he got the wrong target in his sights when he went after the network executives. The latter are pleading innocent at the top of their lungs, denying that they ever injected any bias into news coverage. They are right—all they do is merchandise a product.

In substantive terms, I have yet to meet a top TV executive who could find his way from A to B without a "task force" and/or a Seeing Eye dog. Since they don't know anything about the news, it is unfair to accuse them of loading dice.

Indeed, I am prepared to go further: I doubt if there are more than half a dozen television news commentators who have any sense of substance. Just for a test, I would like to pull all the scripts at the last minute and see who freezes and who talks.

Eric Sevareid and Howard K. Smith, real craftsmen, would clearly have no problems but $1 gets you $8 if Walter Cronkite could perform. In other words, most "commentators" are not commentators at all—they are just talking machines.

Which gets us to the crucial level, the one that Agnew totally overlooked: who prepares the records for the talking machines? Who writes the script? Who decides which Viet Nam sequence goes on the tube: the Hue massacres? Or Vice Pres. Ky making a silly speech? Who determines for the waiting millions which Negroes become "black leaders?" Who picks out the shot of Barry Goldwater, Richard Nixon, Lyndon Johnson, or Hubert Humphrey that will leap into millions of living rooms?

This is the gut level of TV news. Most people probably do not realize that the camera is a deadly weapon. In the course of a campaign, for example, a candidate is under constant, intimate surveillance.

Every day hundreds, maybe thousands of feet of video tape are rushed back for processing and then somebody sits in a dark room and picks the footage that will appear at 6 p.m. What is the basis of his decision? If he, say, likes John Kennedy, will he pick a sequence that makes Richard Nixon look like Lon Chaney with a hangover? If he is anti-war, will he feature Hubert Humphrey as the village idiot? It isn't hard.

Of course, this isn't just true of TV. News magazines play games with photographs too, though not with the same audience impact. Some years ago a colleague of mine went through three months of a prominent weekly and cut out the pictures of obscure newsmakers. He pasted them in a book and asked a class to look at them and then guess whether the accompanying story was favorable or unfavorable. The results were incredible; the students averaged about 98% including two shots of the same man, once with a favorable story (handsome side-shot), and once with an unfavorable (full-face from below with emphasis on jowls and double-chin).

THE MEN WHO PICK these pictures, whether for TV or journals, belong to that anonymous body, the production staff. I have had considerable contact with them over the past decade and have found them to be bright, talented, and extraordinarily opinionated.

They are not in any sense conspirators—they just feel they have an obligation to bring truth to the public. Often I have shared their convictions—for example, in favor of Kennedy, in opposition to Goldwater—but I have always shuddered at the unchecked power they have in their hands.

This is not an argument for censorship nor an attack on the individuals concerned. They are simply human beings behaving like human beings. On the contrary, it is an argument against a system that treats news as a "product" rather than a subjective, controversial affair, which can not be pre-packaged like breakfast cereal.

In short, let us get commentators who are commentators—who do not disguise themselves as Delphic oracles—and turn them loose at 6 p.m. to fight out the day's news.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Poverty Rediscovered:

Inequity in Income Distribution Refutes Myth of U.S. Affluence

The following is excerpted from an article "The Myth of American Affluence" which appeared in the October issue of Commentary. Written by Stephen Thernstrom, it deals with a new edition of the book "The Affluent Society" by John Kenneth Galbraith.

THE MYTH of American affluence which Galbraith helped to create mirrored the dominant political and social tendencies of the age of Eisenhower. Whatever the author's intent, the book directed attention away from the economic deprivation which was still commonplace in the United States and provided the well-to-do with an intellectually respectable vantage point from which to criticize the materialistic strivings of the vulgar masses rather than the American social order itself.

In recent years the mythology has undergone significant modification, with the rediscovery of poverty and the deepening racial crisis. Yet the assumption of affluence dies hard. It continues to influence popular perceptions of the nature of our society, and impedes the formation of political alignments which might bring about constructive social change.

When The Affluent Society was first published there were very few Americans who lived in truly Asiatic poverty, crammed eight or ten to a room in houses without clean water and modern plumbing, subsisting on rice or potatoes, with infant mortality rates of 400-500 per 1,000 and a life expectancy of 20 years or so. Poverty in the absolute subsistence sense was virtually, though not entirely, obliterated; the "real" needs of even the poorest were being satisfied. But the distinction between "real" and "artificial" needs was irrelevant and unreal.

In 1958, 60 percent of all families and unrelated individuals in the United States earned less than $6,000, and more than a third took in less than $4,000. The top 20 percent of income earners, meanwhile, were raking in nearly half of the total, with 20 percent of it going to the richest 5 percent.

The needs of the bottom 60 percent were surely as "real" as the needs of those on the top, a good deal more real in the sense that the people on the bottom had a far harder time making ends meet.

The myth of affluence encouraged the complacent illusion that poverty had been eliminated and that unequal distribution of income was no longer a problem. The problem was rather that the masses were lusting after the bread and circuses devised by the admen. Few of those who mouthed the cliché about American affluence felt themselves to be blessed with excessive income. The assumption was that others were not sufficiently spiritual to make proper use of their undue affluence.

If a new awareness of the economic plight of the bottom quarter or so of the income distribution pyramid has developed in recent years—the notion that virtually all Americans are affluent enough to satisfy their "real" needs with plenty left over for foolish luxuries is heard no more—an element of the myth of affluence is still very much with us.

This is the myth of the affluent worker and the trade union establishment. For the assumption of the '50s that the ordinary citizen was prosperous, indeed too prosperous, for his own good, we have substituted a view that is little more sophisticated. There are the very poor, the underclass (erroneously thought to be composed mainly of blacks), and there are the affluent, the latter including even the most menial white-collar employes and organized blue-collar workers.

Some of the affluent—upper-middle-class liberals—understand that it is the duty of the rich to help the poor, and are happy to do so, especially when it can be accomplished by measures which, like "community control," have no effect on the rich themselves.

The organized working class, however, and the lumpen-bourgeoisie remain stubbornly oblivious of their duty and selfishly attached to their privileges—the new Mustang, the two-family dwelling in Queens.

THE CONCEPT of relative deprivation cannot be introduced to demonstrate the poverty of those earning less than $3,000 and then dropped in favor of an absolute standard when considering the position of people a rung or two higher up the economic ladder, so that the carpenter or factory worker supporting a family of five on $6,000 or $7,000 a year is suddenly seen as an established fat cat with more money than he knows what to do with.

It is common in upper-middle-class circles to bemoan the outrageous wages commanded by skilled workers, so much so that the plumber problem has become the servant problem of our time. But the median earnings of skilled craftsmen employed fulltime in the United States in 1966, the most recent year for which data are available, were only $6,981, a princely income only to those who have never attempted to live on it.

It is hardly surprising that people scraping by on the wages provided by most unionized blue-collar or menial white-collar jobs feel embittered when they encounter the assumption that poverty shades into comfortable affluence at the $3,000 or $4,000 line, or the equally common belief that economic deprivation in this society is confined largely to Negroes. Nor is it surprising that many are fearful, rigidly defensive, and punitive about the blacks who seem to threaten them, with the support of upper-middle-class liberals.

Intellectuals on the left must broaden their concern, to embrace not only the very poor but those who, through painful struggle, have inched a short rung or two up the slippery ladder of success. If the upper working class and lower middle class conceive of themselves as "forgotten men," and ally themselves with Nixon or worse, it is hard to see where the political muscle necessary for constructive social change can come from.

State Plan Deplored:

HRDI Stresses Continuation Of National Manpower Efforts

THE ADMINISTRATION PLAN to shift the emphasis of federal manpower efforts to the states could trigger "major retreats" in the programs, the director of labor's major manpower program warned.

Most states lack the "experience and manpower—trained manpower" needed to effectively carry out the programs, declared Merlin Taylor, director of the Human Resources Development Institute, a non-profit corporation created by the AFL-CIO. Moreover, he stressed, "very few states actually have enabling legislation to handle the money that will come to them."

Taylor, who was a Labor Dept. manpower official in the Johnson Administration, said he is convinced that "manpower efforts that have been developed nationally . . . should be continued nationally."

He was questioned by reporters on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference.

Taylor said the major HRDI effort during its first 13 months has been directed at helping "disadvantaged or hard-to-employ" workers adjust to new and unfamiliar work situations. He said that through the institute's "Buddy Program," nearly 500 new workers have been given man-to-man assistance and guidance by HRDI trained fellow workers.

"THE UNIONS have a dominant role in whether or not a particular training program is going to go into a particular skill or craft," he said, and the HRDI representatives "lay out what the program will actually do for the local union and for the members."

Taylor reported that a round of meetings has begun to consider, discuss the program, and perhaps re-fund the HRDI, a joint labor-government effort, beyond its initial 15-month span. He said he feels they are getting a "sympathetic ear from the Dept. of Labor on this."

MOST OF US FIRMLY BELIEVE in a basic American tenet, "equal justice under law."

Like many such ideals, however, this one sometimes rings hollow.

Individuals or groups just do not have the money to utilize all the avenues the law provides.

When the Economic Opportunity Act was passed, a partial answer to this obstacle was provided. The legislation authorized the Legal Services Program.

Currently some 1,800 lawyers around the country are paid by the government to represent poor people in 270 communities at a cost of $50 million a year. "Equal justice under law," under this program, has become a reality rather than a hollow tenet.

Under the program, California Rural Legal Assistance—to use an important example—has taken up the fight for the poor. And in the process it has tangled with the state's conservative governor, Ronald Reagan.

Last year, Reagan, who vigorously objected to CRLA's efforts on behalf of the farm workers, tried to veto its budget. When OEO threatened to override the veto—a power it has under current law—Reagan had to change his mind.

CRLA helped do some other things which Reagan did not like, including:

- Forced the governor to reinstate budget cuts he made in the medical program.
- Dealt the death blow to legal importation of Mexican braceros for U.S. farm jobs.
- Opened the way to prosecute growers for hiring illegally imported Mexican farm workers.
- Forced 18 California county governments to join the government surplus food program for the poor.

Along with some other conservative governors, Reagan was unhappy that the legal services in the war on poverty permitted government-paid lawyers to represent the poor as a group.

Riding to Reagan's rescue has been his colleague, Sen. George Murphy (R-Calif.). In October Murphy tacked an amendment on a two-year Senate extension of the Economic Opportunity Act which would give governors absolute veto power over the legal services programs in their states. As noted, under current law a governor's veto could be overriden by the director of OEO.

THE MURPHY AMENDMENT was passed by 45 to 40. After passage, Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.) introduced another amendment giving the President power to override a governor's veto. The Senate did a strange thing. It accepted this amendment providing Murphy did not object. He did object, so the Senate is now committed to supporting the Murphy Amendment in a probable House-Senate conference.

The House has not acted but is expected to move on the legislation sometime in December.

A former conservative Republican congressman, Donald Rumsfeld, is now the director of OEO. He is bitterly opposed to the Murphy Amendment.

"A balance was carefully devised by the Congress and it has worked well," Rumsfeld said. "It should not be changed lightly. I will oppose this amendment in the House."

The American Bar Association is also sharply critical of the Murphy Amendment.

The National Legal Aid & Defender Association issued a statement, declaring: "To tell the poor now that legal services are to be cut back would destroy the gains already achieved by the program."

Organized labor is vigorously opposing the Murphy Amendment in the House bill.

Basically, it's a rather simple issue, engraved deep in the stone edifice of the United States Supreme Court: "Equal Justice Under Law."

"MAJOR RETREATS" in federal manpower programs could result from the Administration's decentralization plan, Dir. Merlin Taylor, center, of the Human Resources Development Institute, warned on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Sam Sharkey, left, of the Newhouse Newspapers and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc. The interview program is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual radio network.

Drive Pressed in Congress For Strong Job Safety Law

Thomas R. Donahue, SEIU executive secretary.

Biemiller emphasized that more than 14,000 workers have been killed on the job since the AFL-CIO appeared before the Senate subcommittee last year on behalf of similar health-safety legislation. Another 2.2 million workers have been injured, he added.

Praising Pres. Nixon for focusing on the need for health and safety legislation in a message to Congress, Biemiller said the issue no longer is whether there should be legislation, "but what kind of legislation should be enacted."

He cited these main reasons why the AFL-CIO favors the Williams bill over an Administration-backed measure:

- The Williams bill empowers the Secretary of Labor to issue safety and health standards, based on recommendations of the Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare. It contains strong enforcement features, including the power to close unsafe operations.
- The Administration bill to establish a five-member Occupational Health & Safety Board "would constitute another layer of bureaucracy," remote from workers' problems and accessible to them only through "a costly and time-consuming hearing process."
- The Administration bill, in effect, would rely on private standard-setting organizations that tend to be dominated by management and often "move with glacial speed in grinding out their standards."

"As far as organized labor is concerned," Biemiller declared, "we still cling to the belief that the Dept. of Labor was created for the purpose of protecting the legitimate interests of workers, and the Dept. of HEW, the nation's health, including the workplace."

In the area of coverage, Biemiller noted that both bills exclude public employes and cover federal workers only indirectly. He urged full coverage for these workers as "a matter of morality."

Jennings, in testimony delivered by IUE Legislative Dir. John H. Callahan, discussed inadequate safeguards against chemical and radiation perils, with emphasis on the union's biggest employer, General Electric Co. (Story this page.)

The testimony hit at the present lack of state and federal health and safety inspectors and the tendency of inspectors to notify a plant of an impending visit, giving management a chance to "pretty up" the place. The O'Hara-Williams bill would help provide more inspectors and unannounced plant inspections.

USWA Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Burke noted that under the Administration bill the Sec. of Labor "is not his own man" in enforcing standards because he must go back to "the board" for a long hearing procedure to determine a violation.

In other ways, he continued, the Secretary of Labor "is practically the servant of the board. It strips him of promulgation powers. . . . It makes him report to itself the findings of his inspections."

He called on Congress to enact "far-reaching" legislation that does not depend upon consensus among standard-setting groups but gives "a strong and direct responsibility" to the Depts. of Labor and HEW.

A large part of Mazzocchi's testimony for OCAW consisted of direct quotations from workers in oil and chemical plants regarding "shocking" illnesses suffered through exposure to uncontrolled fumes, gases, chemicals and acids.

There were reports of gases that cause workers to "turn blue" and faint, lung deterioration from chlorine gas, deaths from hydrogen sulfide, nerve damage from several chemicals, brain damage from fumes, cancer from radiation, and breathing and skin troubles from soap enzymes.

While industry spokesmen plead for voluntary approaches to safety and health protection, Mazzocchi noted "much of our problem is based on a lack of voluntary action and a lack of cooperation by management."

Donahue centered his testimony on "unnecessary risks and hazards" to union members in hospitals and nursing homes and the window cleaning industry. He cited dangers from X-rays, electrical equipment and wet floors.

The board called for in the Administration bill, he said, cannot function as effectively as the Secretaries of Labor and HEW in developing and enforcing health-safety standards.

However, he strongly urged that the O'Hara-Williams bill be amended to cover the 9 million employes of local, state and federal governments.

THE LAND REFORM program of South Viet Nam's government was a topic of conversation between Pres. Tran Quoc Buu, right, of the Vietnamese Confederation of Labor and Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Maine). The program has long been urged by the labor movement and Muskie wanted to get Buu's views while the latter was in Washington conferring with AFL-CIO leaders.

Safety Bill Testimony Cites GE Job Hazards

General Electric's disregard for collective bargaining is matched by its disregard for providing a safe, healthy workplace, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers told Congress.

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings said the giant corporation, which has forced a strike by its one-offer-only bargaining attitude, has repeatedly ignored union appeals for safety measures.

Examples of GE "management neglect," some of which led to tragic accidents, ran through testimony he and other IUE leaders gave to a House Labor subcommittee in calling for a strong occupational health and safety bill.

Other witnesses were John H. Callahan, IUE legislative director, who presented Jennings's testimony because the union's president was occupied in efforts to settle the strike, and Jack Suarez, IUE safety director.

Jennings described an occasion at a GE plant in Louisville when a worker cleaning machinery with kerosene was told to go outside and refill his container from a pump. He went and returned. Minutes later there was a flash of flame. The man was burned to death.

"Our people investigated," Jennings said, "and found there were two pumps outside, neither labeled as to content. One had kerosene, the other contained gasoline."

GE management of the Schnectady, N.Y., plant, Jennings reported, has regularly ignored IUE's calls for color-coding of air lines—hoses containing air or gases—to identify their contents.

A few weeks ago, just before the strike began, one worker mistakenly hooked up a hose he thought contained air. It contained oxygen. The employe was severely burned by a resultant flare. Later another worker was burned using the same line.

In another Schenectady case, Jennings reported, an untrained worker, without a mask, was overcome by carbon monoxide gas while descending into a pit. He fell to the bottom. Now he is partially paralyzed.

Getting masks for workers who must work in areas where there are dangerous gases has been another IUE campaign which GE has resisted, testimony revealed.

Jennings and Suarez recalled that GE workers "ate large doses of radiation" between the time the company discovered that its color-TV sets emitted excessive radiation in 1966 and 1967 when the danger was made public and corrected.

"To this day," Jennings said, "GE has refused to furnish workers with radiation-detection film badges at its Syracuse plant, where the sets are assembled."

Denying workers a record of radiation exposure, Jennings added, doubly benefits GE management because workers who seek compensation for any future adverse effects will find it difficult to prove they were affected by exposure, and the firm's safety record "will look better than the facts warrant."

"And GE goes a long way to keep its record looking good," Jennings pointed out, noting that it has paid injured people to work, some on crutches, "just to avoid showing lost-time injuries."

During recent negotiations with GE, the IUE president said, "We asked for joint safety committees and adequate provision of medical facilities and the company said this was a cost item and had to wait for the economic part of their package offer."

What the company was saying, he continued, was that "if we settle for 2 cents less in the pay envelope, maybe we get 2 cents more protection against health and safety hazards. . . . It is a terrible attitude."

Even so, Jennings added, when GE came out with its package offer there wasn't "one word or one cent in it for safety. Not one word nor one cent."

Nationwide Campaign Pushes Postal Pay Bill

The men who deliver the mail have turned to the households they serve to ask for help in winning approval of a pay bill pending in Congress.

Their immediate goal is to remove the threat of a presidential veto from a House-passed bill currently before the Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committee.

It provides step increases amounting to a 5.4 percent pay hike, top pay after eight years of service instead of after 25 years, and establishment of a Federal Wage Commission to determine future federal pay scales.

In a massive advertising campaign in about 400 newspapers, the Letter Carriers have presented their case to the public and asked readers to sign a coupon urging Pres. Nixon to sign the House bill "and help save our postal service."

An additional 6 million coupons have been printed—to be distributed primarily by letter carriers retracing their postal routes and by their wives through the union's active auxiliary program.

NALC Pres. James H. Rademacher told a news conference that the postal service faces its "worst catastrophe" if its workers are denied a pay raise.

The turnover rate is already 23 percent a year, he said, and the government spends more than $100 million annually to locate, hire and train replacements.

Last summer, Rademacher noted, the union had to issue emergency "cool it" advice to members to avert widespread work stoppages and "sick leave actions" despite a federal ban on strikes. Even without a work stoppage, Rademacher said, the postal system would be clogged beyond capacity if its employes merely followed the rules strictly, including safety checks that are now skimped on because of the volume of work to be done.

Local branches of the NALC are financing advertisements in 396 papers through voluntary contributions by members, Rademacher said, with at least one advertisement scheduled in each congressional district in the nation.

"We're spending an awful lot of money to cause the President to think twice" about the impact of a veto, he declared.

Meanwhile the top officers of all AFL-CIO postal unions presented joint testimony to the Senate, delivered by Postal Clerks Pres. Francis S. Filbey, rejecting an Administration effort to tie postal raises to legislation shifting the postal service to a postal corporation.

The Postal Clerks have also filed a federal suit seeking to have the government's no-strike law declared unconstitutional. The Letter Carriers earlier successfully challenged the constitutionality of the no-strike pledge which had been required of federal workers.

GE's Responsibilty for Walkout Stressed in Ads by Striking Unions

Unions whose members are on strike at General Electric Co. said in newspaper advertisements that "the strike will end when GE shows it is ready to obey the law and bargain in good faith with the unions its employes have chosen."

The ads appeared Nov. 28 in newspapers throughout the country, primarily in cities where GE has plants. Nearly 150,000 GE workers have been on strike for over a month.

Headlined "Let's Keep the Record Straight: GE Is Responsible for This Strike," the ads point out that GE's "take-it-or-leave-it" collective bargaining policy has been declared an unfair labor practice by the National Labor Relations Board and the U.S. Court of Appeals.

The advertisement says: "We're on strike to end GE's arrogant policy of 'take it or leave it.' What we want is democratic 'give and take' with GE at the collective bargaining table. . . .

"In other words . . . we want an early, sound settlement so we can all go back to work."

"GE thinks it is above the law," the ads say, noting that the company has been haled into court on "serious charges of law violation" nearly 20 times since 1911.

GE workers struck after the company refused to negotiate beyond an unacceptable initial offer on new collective bargaining agreements. Noting this, the ads say:

"For years, GE has made a mockery of the process of collective bargaining that has worked so well in other American industries . . . GE's policy is simply 'take it or leave it.' . . . GE employes have been taking this kind of stuff for years. We've had it up to here. When GE said 'take it or leave it' again this year, we left it. And went on strike."

The ads continue:

"GE pretends it wants to protect the public from inflation. Yet on Nov. 15 GE once again announced another price rise on more of its products!

"GE claims its wage and benefit proposals provide what's 'right' for the employes. But GE wages are falling far behind the cost of living, far behind the levels in other big American manufacturing industries. In contrast, GE's profits after taxes have risen 78 percent since 1960; last year its profit rate was 22 percent higher than in manufacturing as a whole.

"GE claims it does the 'right thing' for its employes. But the NLRB and the courts have found GE guilty many times of unfair labor practices like spying, firings for union activity, illegal interrogations, etc."

CPI Jumps Again:

Real Wages Sapped By Climbing Prices

On the earnings side, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that gross average weekly earnings of production and non-supervisory workers fell by 86 cents between September and October to $116.94.

The decrease, BLS said, was due to a four-tenths of an hour reduction in average weekly hours, which more than offset a 1-cent gain in hourly earnings.

For the worker with three dependents, weekly take-home pay amounted to $101.78 in October, a drop of 66 cents. For the worker with no dependents, the decline was 63 cents to $92.67.

When expressed in 1957-59 dollars to adjust for price changes, take-home pay averaged $78.41 for the worker with three dependents and $71.39 for the worker with no dependents. Both of these figures represented a more than 1 percent drop from September.

Real spendable earnings for the worker with three dependents were eight-tenths of 1 percent under October 1968 and 1.5 percent below a record high in September 1968.

In 1969, BLS pointed out, real spendable earnings have been below year-ago figures in every month since February.

Dr. Joel Popkin, BLS assistant commissioner, noted that "since mid-year the rate of price increase has leveled off" but he declined to speculate on price increases in relation to the Administration's anti-inflation efforts.

Labor Dept. figures showed that over the year the CPI has increased at an annual rate of 5.6 percent. Services are up at a rate of 7.2 percent and commodities have climbed by 4.8 percent.

Among individual items, the rates of increase are: Household services, 9.3 percent; transportation, 7.8 percent; medical care, 7.4 percent; apparel commodities, 5.4 percent; and food, 5.2 percent.

The September-to-October increase in the CPI resulted mostly from higher prices for new and used cars, apparel and most kinds of consumer services, BLS said.

The cost of housing rose six-tenths of 1 percent, led by a jump of 1.2 percent in the cost of interest on home mortgages. Women's clothing, up 1.3 percent, led the rise in apparels. Prices of men's topcoats, suits and slacks also showed significant increases.

Food prices edged down seasonally in October, the government said. Prices for meats, particularly beef, and fresh fruits were down more than seasonally and helped to offset a sizable increase in the cost of restaurant meals.

Of 88,000 workers who will receive cost-of-living pay hikes based on October's CPI, BLS said, about 52,000 of them are in automotive, farm equipment and office supply industries where the increases will range from 1 to 4 cents an hour. An additional 6,000 workers in automotive equipment will get boosts ranging from 5 to 9 cents.

Nearly 18,000 transit workers in Chicago, Boston, and Pittsburgh will be given hourly increases ranging from 2 to 8 cents. About 6,700 printers in New York City will receive 2 percent wage increases. More than 2,000 employes of Nevada contractors will receive 6-cent hourly raises.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION students from all sections of the nation visited the AFL-CIO headquarters as part of a program arranged by the Vocational Industrial Clubs of America. Stuart Brock of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, spoke to the group and answered questions.

Expanded Aid Pressed for Mental Health

Community mental health centers are helping to keep workers on the job and families from being broken up, the AFL-CIO said in testimony urging expanded federal aid in building and staffing the centers.

Legislative Rep. Clinton Fair, accompanied by Lawrence Smedley of the federation's Dept. of Social Security, urged a House subcommittee to take the best provisions of several bills extending the program—and add to them.

Fair termed mental illness "a major national problem," hitting hardest at those who can't afford expensive private treatment and who too often are shunted off to state mental institutions.

He said the nearly 500 community mental health centers built and staffed with federal aid have "significantly reduced the need for more expensive long-term hospitalization and custodial care."

The AFL-CIO asked the House Commerce Subcommittee on Public Health to extend the period that the federal government pays a major part of staff salaries from the first 51 months that a community center is in operation to a full 10 years. Otherwise, he warned centers may have to cut back on services or close entirely.

Fair also urged that payments be broadened to include subsidy of salaries of sub-professionals and administrative personnel.

The AFL-CIO strongly supported proposals to provide a larger federal contribution to build and staff centers in urban and rural poverty areas.

It also urged larger amounts than those provided in bills being considered by the committee for community center treatment of alcoholism and drug abuse.

Clothing Workers Sue To Bar Rejection of Ads

Chicago—The Chicago Joint Board of the Clothing Workers has filed suit in the U.S. District Court here to require four daily newspapers to accept the union's full-page advertisement explaining why it was picketing the Marshall Field & Co. store to protest the sale of imported men's clothing.

The picketing, part of the union's national campaign to alert consumers to the danger to American jobs posed by the rising flood of imports, was accompanied in Chicago by mass leafleting and by a full-page ad addressed to the public. When the newspapers refused to accept the ad, the union filed suit.

The suit contends that the newspapers publish Field's ads featuring the imported clothing, but refused, "without legal justification," to publish the union's ad "for communication of the plaintiff's position to the public" about the sale.

Being sued are the Chicago Tribune Co., its subsidiary, the Chicago American Publishing Co., and Field Enterprises, publisher of the Chicago Sun-Times and the Chicago Daily News.

The newspapers admit turning down the ad.

A spokesman for the Chicago Tribune is reported to have said, "It is our policy never to give a reason for refusing an ad."

The Field publications explained that they do not accept ads that attack an organization or an individual by name. But the papers have carried an ad of the American Tobacco Co., which attacked the New York Times by name.

The Field Co., one of the nation's largest department stores, has taken the position that it can and should sell as much of the apparel as it desires, the union says. The ACWA, however, contends that the store has failed to advise its customers "of the possible adverse economic effect that the importation and sale" of the clothing might have on American workers who make men's and boys' clothing.

The ACWA suit asks for an injunction prohibiting the newspapers from publishing any Field's ad featuring or mentioning imported clothing unless they also publish the union's ad. It further asks for reimbursement for the cost of preparing the ad and for punitive damages.

Senate Begins Action On Tax Reform Bill

A letter signed by 173 House members endorsed the Gore proposal.

Among the amendments waiting to be offered on the Senate floor is a proposal by Sen. Paul J. Fannin (R-Ariz.) to punish unions for engaging in political or legislative activities by making their income subject to taxation.

Union dues money, under existing law, cannot be used for contributions to candidates for federal office. That money comes from voluntary contributions to COPE and comparable political action programs of various unions.

But the broadly-worded Fannin amendment would eliminate the tax-exempt status of any labor organization if any dues money were used "directly or indirectly . . . to support or oppose any candidates for public office or for other political purposes."

The amendment is being pushed by the National Right to Work Committee which, under the Fannin amendment, would be able to retain its tax-exempt status while engaging in political campaigns to enact compulsory open shop laws.

The Right to Work Committee's newsletter said that Fannin had promised at the organization's annual board meeting in January to use his position on the Senate Finance Committee to challenge "the tax-exempt status of these empires built by union moguls."

Employer groups deeply involved in political and legislative activities, such as the National Association of Manufacturers, would also retain tax exempt status.

Fannin's amendment was rejected on an 8-8 tie vote in the Senate Finance Committee.

During the first day of Senate debate on the tax bill, Sen. John J. Williams (R-Del.) sought to close a loophole the Finance Committee had widened in the oil depletion allowance. His amendment was defeated by eight votes, but 37 senators were absent, more than voted on either side of the question.

Also beaten was a move by Alabama Sen. James B. Allen to double the personal exemption without changing other tax relief provisions of the committee bill—which would have resulted in an $18 billion-a-year revenue loss. In contrast, the Gore amendment would be a substitute for rate cuts in the pending legislation.

Still to be acted on are amendments dealing with loophole-closing, some to tighten the committee bill and others to undo some of its reform provisions.

The contrasting viewpoints were put in sharp focus at one point in the debate. Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.) charged that business lobbyists "expertly and diligently" convinced the Senate Finance Committee to water down the House bill after public attention had drifted away from the issue of tax reform.

Sen. John G. Tower (R-Tex.) replied that tax incentives to business were important to the economy. "It was never meant," he asserted, "that all should share equally in the fruits of the system. It is important to refuse the temptation to confuse equality with equity."

House Okays $2.2 Billion In Foreign Aid

The House voted 176-163 approval of a $2.2 billion spending ceiling on foreign military, economic and technical aid—an amount $437 million less than Pres. Nixon had sought.

While the House beat back most attempts to cut the authorization legislation, the big battle is expected over the separate appropriations bill which in the past has always been below the spending ceiling.

The House added, in a floor amendment, a $54.5 million authorization for a squadron of fighter jets for Nationalist China. It also approved committee amendments adding funds for South Korea and for a water desalinization plant in Israel.

The House bill would provide about $1.75 billion in economic aid and $450 million in military assistance. It sets the ceiling on development loans at $250 million less than the Administration asked and cut Alliance for Progress funds $116 million.

Bakery Workers Reunited in Merger

New Union To Bargain For 150,000

By Eugene A. Kelly

Miami Beach—Two unions of bakery workers ended 12 years of separation by joining together as one consolidated union under charter from the AFL-CIO.

After preliminary separate conventions, the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers, AFL-CIO, and the Bakery & Confectionery Workers were reunited in an emotionally moving first convention of the newly chartered Bakery & Confectionery Workers International Union of America.

Representing a combined total of 150,000 workers, practitioners of one of the world's oldest trades clasped hands with old friends, stood together to sing the "Star Spangled Banner" and "O Canada," and adopted a set of goals designed to make every worker in the industry a convinced and vigorous trade unionist.

The merger had been approved by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its first meeting following the federation's recent convention.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland were there to present the charter and congratulate them. So were former AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, who is a former B&C president; Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers, who also heads the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher; COPE Dir. Al Barkan and others.

The merger convention was called to order by Wesley Reedy of ABC Local 6, Philadelphia, assistant to Kirkland, who has been at AFL-CIO headquarters in Washington since Schnitzler, who recently retired, first assumed the secretary-treasurer's post.

Reedy introduced Max Kralstein, B & C president who in turn introduced ABC Pres. Daniel E. Conway and gave him the gavel. Conway then formally presided over the merger convention as the incoming president.

The merger agreement was read and approved. So was an implementation agreement providing for the merger to take effect upon approval of merger terms and a new constitution by the separate ABC and B & C conventions. Key passages include these:

"This agreement does not contemplate a merger of the ABC into the B&C," nor the reverse. It does not contemplate that either the ABC or the B&C shall be deemed

GE Fund Tops $1 Million; Boycott Grows in Strength

BOYCOTT PICKETING of General Electric products by these union members at the Wisconsin Electric Power Co. in Milwaukee won an enthusiastic response from most citizens who entered the building. It was learned that the firm sold only two small GE appliances during a day of special sales promotion. It was part of labor's nationwide boycott drive.

Talks Fail To Budge Company

By Duane Emme

Contributions to the General Electric strike relief fund topped the million-dollar mark as AFL-CIO affiliates pressed a national boycott of GE and Hotpoint-brand products.

Federation Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, who announced the status of the fund, reported that it received the largest single contribution to date—$300,000 from the Ladies' Garment Workers.

ILGWU Pres. Louis Stulberg said the contribution is an advance on the $1-per-member total being collected from the union's ranks.

The ILGWU, he added, fully understands the "crucial nature" of the GE strike "and we are determined to mobilize all our forces to assure a swift, decisive victory for the strikers—both for their own just cause and to safeguard the basic rights and very existence of the entire American trade union movement."

In another development, the AFL-CIO announced that it is planning a new series of "double-B" rallies around the country—the designation standing for "a buck and a boycott."

In his latest report on the strike relief fund, started with a $50,000 contribution from the AFL-CIO Executive Council immediately after the strike began, Kirkland also announced:

- Receipt of the first $10,000 weekly installment check from the Textile Workers Union of America. Its executive council voted unanimously to meet the $1-a-member quota for its 122,000 members, payable in weekly installments.
- The Seafarers became the first

Votes $800 Personal Exemption:

Senate Improves Tax Relief For Low, Middle Incomes

By David L. Perlman

The Senate voted to give a greater share of tax relief to low- and middle-income families and less to the rich as it moved toward final action on the tax reform bill.

Rejecting threats of a possible veto, the Senate raised the personal exemption for each taxpayer and dependent from the present $600 to $800 over the next two years.

The proposal, sponsored by Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.), was backed by the AFL-CIO as "far superior" to the rate cuts passed by the House and endorsed by the Senate Finance Committee.

The total amount of the tax cut in the Gore amendment would be virtually the same as in the House bill. But the distribution would be more equitable, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller wrote senators before the vote.

Under the House bill, which the Administration supported, 25 percent of the total tax reductions would go to the top 4.7 percent of taxpayers who earn over $20,000 a year.

In addition to the higher personal exemption, taxpayers with incomes under $10,000 who do not itemize their deductions would benefit by a new $1,000 minimum standard deduction in the Senate bill.

For example, a worker earning $7,000 a year would be able to claim $1,000 in deductions without itemizing as compared with the present $700 allowance.

Another section of the bill would lower the tax rate for single persons, who now pay substantially more than married couples with the same income. And families, of course, would gain most by the $800-per-person exemption.

While improving the tax relief portion of the bill, the Senate seriously weakened the House-passed repeal of the 7 percent investment tax credit—a windfall for business which has been termed the most inflationary factor in the present tax law.

By a vote of 48-41, it kept the tax credit on investments up to $20,000 a year. That means that all firms, big or small, will be able

Struck Beef Company Sets Up Armed Camp

Dakota City, Neb.—"Scab city" is being built here behind a six-foot fence, topped with barbed wire.

In this enclosure, the Iowa Beef Packers management is building 50 cement-block houses for the strikebreakers it has brought in from the Mexican-border areas of California and Texas.

It's management's answer to its regular workers who joined the Meat Cutters and went on strike more than three months ago to achieve wage parity with other packinghouse workers. The average pay at Iowa Beef, including skilled jobs, is 98 cents an hour less than average common labor rate in the rest of the industry, the union reports.

Union pickets refer to the enclosure—where a non-union firm is putting up the houses—as a "concentration camp."

And the plant, itself, is like a besieged castle. A moat-like trench, four-feet deep, surrounds the struck plant. Armed guards and police dogs patrol the perimeter.

Strike Eve Negotiations Lead to Rail Settlement

Negotiators for four shopcraft unions and the railroads reached agreement on a new contract covering 48,000 workers, averting a possible nationwide shutdown of railroad service.

The agreement was reached in marathon bargaining sessions held at the Labor Dept. under the direction of Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz and Assistant Sec. of Labor W. J. Usery, Jr.

Details of the settlement were not officially available pending ratification by each union's members, except that it was announced that the proposal will cover 1970 as well as retroactive 1969 wage increases.

The unions—Machinists, Boilermakers, Sheet Metal Workers and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers—have been trying for more than a year to settle a dispute involving basic wages and skill pay.

Under the terms of the Railway Labor Act, which requires a 30-day status quo period following

Iowa Beef Firm Transforms Plant Into Armed Camp, 'Scab Town'

A union member, meanwhile, lies in a Sioux City hospital—shot by a strikebreaker.

The victim is 24-year-old Raymond Gonzales, who was on picket duty at the plant's main gate on Nov. 21.

According to union witnesses, his assailant drove from the plant in a car, swerved the vehicle in an attempt to hit several pickets, then got out of the car and fired four shots from a 32 caliber automatic. Two of the shots struck Gonzales in the abdomen. Another picket narrowly escaped when a shot went through his sleeve.

Dakota County authorities have refused to file charges, indicating they consider the shooting excused under a recently-enacted Nebraska "self-defense" law.

The union reports that the sheriff was "not interested" in talking to witnesses to the shooting.

Dave Hart, district vice president of the Meat Cutters, said the "scab town" construction was begun after strikebreakers housed in the struck plant began quitting because of poor conditions.

Some of them told the union that they were charged a $45 "fare" for being flown to Sioux City on a company plane, with the money deducted from their first paychecks.

Pickets, talking bitterly of the company town being built, wonder when the firm will take the next step and put in a company store. Then the captive workers can "owe their soul to the company store," as the coal-mining song goes.

The new company town won't be much of an improvement over the desolate company towns of an earlier generation. It lacks drainage, union pickets report. It is alongside a railroad right-of-way and is adjacent to a rendering plant.

Before importing strikebreakers from California and Mexico, the company tried unsuccessfully to recruit American Indians.

Hart told newsmen that the company's use of outside strikbreakers—drawn from an underprivileged minority group—is part of its "19th Century labor relations." Iowa Beef's management, he said, "is simply preying on people who are exploited all the time anyway."

In his office in the struck plant, company chairman Currier J. Holman "had a tear-gas gun visible in his breast pocket as he talked warily with a visitor," Newsweek magazine reported recently. Armed guards checked every car at the gate and the company's industrial relations manager defended the all-out war on the union by declaring that the firm would have "no future if we come under the full domination of this international union."

Besides the main plant here, three other plants of Iowa Beef have been struck and nearly 1,400 employes are on picket lines.

The AFL-CIO convention in October backed the Meat Cutters boycott against Iowa Beef Packers products.

House Unit Votes 15% Benefit Hike

The House Ways & Means Committee unanimously approved a 15 percent across-the-board increase in social security benefits—50 percent more than the 10 percent increase proposed by the Administration.

The House committee set the effective date for its 15 percent bill as Jan. 1, 1970. The Administration had asked that a 10 percent hike become effective Mar. 1, and proposed increases in both the taxable wage base and the tax rate.

Ways & Means Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) said the committee will put off action on other social security and welfare changes until early next year. He predicted that the 15 percent hike would clear Congress before Christmas.

Need for Planning Stressed:

Postwar Transition Keyed to Jobs Policy

Advance planning can ease the problems of adjusting the nation's economy to a peacetime level of defense spending, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger testified.

But a key ingredient, he told the Senate Labor Committee, is a government fiscal and monetary policy geared to achieving full employment in an expanding economy.

If the overall economy is healthy, Goldfinger stressed, it will be very much easier to deal with the specific areas where a shift away from defense production will have a heavy impact on workers and communities.

The Senate committee has been holding hearings on conversion from a wartime to a peacetime economy as a guide to legislative action that may be necessary to minimize hardship and dislocation.

Goldfinger told the panel that the magnitude of the problem is substantially less than after World War II, when military spending accounted for 41 percent of the nation's total production, and less than the post-Korea period, when defense costs reached a high of 13.4 percent of the gross national product. Currently, he said, defense spending amounts to only 8.6 percent of GNP and the Viet Nam war costs only about 3 percent.

Even though the shift away from defense production might have only "modest impact" on the overall economy, the effect will be sharply felt in areas where defense production has been a major source of employment, Goldfinger stressed.

Advance Notice

He urged the committee to prod the Defense Dept. to give the maximum possible advance notice of cutbacks—to companies affected, unions representing the workers, and to the U.S. Employment Service.

For employes of private firms, he urged, the employment service should set up special facilities in or near the plant and provide workers with information about job opportunities both in the immediate area and in other localities as well.

Legislation should be enacted to provide relocation grants to workers and their families who need to move to other cities to find employment, Goldfinger said. He renewed also the AFL-CIO's call for federal standards of unemployment compensation.

Since many of the workers displaced may be the Defense Dept.'s own employes, the government should be a model employer in helping to place them in other jobs within and outside government, Goldfinger urged.

The nation's unmet needs, he suggested, make the shift from military to peacetime spending an opportunity "to rebuild the cities, to expand and improve public facilities and services, to halt the destruction of the environment."

But he stressed that "there is nothing automatic" about such a transition.

Congress must act, Goldfinger urged, to provide the increased appropriations to carry out these programs, and the economy must expand to provide jobs for a labor force growing by 1.5 million persons a year as well as to absorb workers displaced by changes in defense-related production and technology.

Goldfinger urged also that the Defense Dept. consider the employment picture in various communities in placing future research, development and production contracts.

Charges Filed With NLRB Up from 1968

The workload of cases for the National Labor Relations Board during the July-September quarter totaled 7,747—5 percent heavier than in the same period a year ago.

The increase was attributed mainly to the 4,957 charges of unfair labor practices filed with the board. This was 8 percent more than in the like 1968 quarter. Election petitions stayed at the same level—3,165 compared with 3,166 a year earlier.

The five-member board issued formal decisions in 87 unfair labor practice cases during the three months. After NLRB regional offices investigated unfair labor practice charges that were filed, the board's general counsel issued 541 formal complaints setting the cases for trial.

In 1,930 collective bargaining elections conducted during the period, 88 percent of the 128,138 workers eligible to vote cast valid ballots, the NLRB said.

Unions won 58 percent or 1,129 elections and AFL-CIO affiliates won the majority of the 1,155 elec- winning 623 and losing 532. Unaffiliated unions won 506 and lost 373 elections.

Of the 4,957 unfair labor charges filed with the board, 3,155 were brought against employers by unions and individuals. The board also reported that 1,802 charges of unfair labor practices were filed against unions in the three months. These include 427 charges involving secondary boycott cases.

Cases awaiting decision by NLRB members at the end of September totaled 575. This compares with 527 in the quarter ended June 30 and 605 as of Sept. 30, 1968.

Overall, there were 10,447 cases pending at various procedural levels at the end of the last quarter. Included were 7,440 cases involving unfair labor practice charges and 2,895 petitions for representation elections.

AFL-CIO Maps New Rallies:

GE Fund Passes $1 Million; Boycott Grows in Strength

AFL-CIO union to oversubscribe the $1-a-member mark, contributing $100,000 for its 85,000 members.

- Receipt of an initial $2,000 contribution from the unaffiliated Salaried Employes Association of Westinghouse Baltimore Divisions. The union said it will make weekly collections from its members for the fund as long as the strike lasts.

The boycott moved into high gear as union members across the country volunteered their spare time to carry informational picket signs and distribute handbills at stores handling GE's products, and at the firm's offices and installations.

As the boycott grew in strength, so did the solidarity of the 150,000 striking members of 13 unions engaged in a struggle for survival with GE, the world's largest electrical manufacturer.

On the bargaining front, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers reported that a union subcommittee had met with the two top labor officials of GE in New York.

"This is the first time in more than 20 years that GE has proposed a subcommittee meeting at this level," IUE Pres. Paul Jennings said, adding, "There is no doubt that this move was brought about by the solidarity of the strike."

Jennings stressed that the full bargaining committee, including unions comprising the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee, as well as two unaffiliated unions, had approved the smaller meeting.

Others taking part in the meeting were IUE Sec.-Treas. David J. Fitzmaurice and John Shambo, chairman of the IUE conference board. Company officials included Philip D. Moore, vice president, and John A. Baldwin, GE's chief negotiator.

"Unfortunately, the meeting consisted almost entirely of another display of GE arrogance," Jennings said. "We got the impression that the company officers wanted to vent their anger on us for the solidarity of the strike—a fact which they conceded."

Shambo said, "The session was a disgrace" and "accomplished absolutely nothing."

The union spokesmen said that they would agree to other subcommittee meetings if GE requests them. Shambo said that this was consistent with the union's continuing efforts to meet daily, including weekends, and for longer hours. GE has declined to accept an intensified schedule.

In an earlier meeting, with CBC representatives sitting in, the company again rejected an IUE offer to submit all issues in the dispute to binding arbitration.

Shambo said all striking employes could be back to work in one day if the company would accept arbitration.

Management, he said, "has not proposed a single change from its totally inadequate and only offer of Oct. 7," even though GE had indicated that it would present a revised offer.

These were some developments in the boycott during the first week after it was announced by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany:

In Milwaukee, members of more than a score of unions joined in picketing the Wisconsin Electric Power Co. after it failed to answer the County Labor Council's letter requesting that it not display and sell GE products.

On the day of the display and sale, with pickets outside, it was learned that the company sold no GE appliances in the morning, only two small appliances in the afternoon.

In Philadelphia, IUE Local 119 and Technical Engineers Local 13 passed out thousands of boycott leaflets at a parade. An IUE member dressed as Santa Claus marched along with signs saying, "Santa Says Don't Buy GE."

In New York, picketing was underway at many retail outlets, with the campaign growing, in intensity. Leaflets were also circulated in Schenectady, Albany, Syracuse, Utica, Buffalo and Troy, N. Y.

Major department stores in downtown Cleveland were picketed and the boycott was being organized in other Ohio cities, including Cincinnati, Dayton and Columbus.

Union members urged shoppers at three major department stores in Baltimore "not to buy" GE products. They also carried the message to the main headquarters of the Gas & Electric Co.

Portland, Ore., unions organized boycott picketing of 30 retail outlets of the city's six major department stores.

After IUE members distributed boycott leaflets at stores in Pittsfield, Mass., they reported that several merchants announced they were removing GE products from their shelves. Union members distributing leaflets in Burlington, Vt., said they received a favorable reception from the public.

Picketing was underway in Atlanta at Rich's, the city's largest department store, and at a number of other stores including discount outlets selling GE merchandise.

When the manager of the Big K discount store in Rome, Ga., learned his store was going to be picketed, he called the Rome Central Labor Council to tell it there was no need for picketing. He had removed all GE products from sale.

The Virginia AFL-CIO announced that it was naming a representative to work on the boycott fulltime, spreading its message and organizing picketing throughout the state.

In Louisville, leaflets on the boycott were being passed out at all major appliance stores in the city and within a 75-mile radius.

In its latest full-page newspaper ads, the company charged IUE with refusing "to get down to the business of bargaining" and trying to avoid bargaining.

A CBC spokesman said, "This lie is enough to make anyone's head spin."

He pointed out that IUE has continuously pressed for negotiations, that the company's "take-it-or-leave-it" offer has been discussed and re-discussed, that it is the only offer the company has made.

"It is GE that hasn't bargained," he said. "It hasn't bargained since 1964. If GE would really bargain, the strike could end in a week."

Another GE ad took note of the boycott, conceding that it would hurt the company and benefit its domestic and foreign competitors.

There were these other developments:

- Picketing was tightened at GE appliance warehouses around the nation, with new lines going up at installations in Baltimore, Washington, D.C., and Cambridge. Columbus and Zanesville, Ohio.
- GE announced the layoff of non-union, hourly employes who have been working at its television receiver plant in Portsmouth, Va The company said the layoffs ar necessary because of a shortage o' parts and materials due to the strike. The layoffs are the first known to have resulted from the strike.
- In Pittsburgh, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and other coordinated unions continued to bargain with Westinghouse Electric Corp.

A TWO-DAY STRIKE by the Masters, Mates & Pilots at United States Lines won the union a goal it has sought for 15 years, negotiation of a contract to cover ships' captains. Here two union members are picketing the company's SS United States and SS American Legion at the Newport News, Va., Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. The union also picketed in New York, Norfolk, Va. and Jacksonville, Fla.

Local Refuses to Bow To 92-Cent Pay Slash

Watertown, Mass.—In the face of a mass layoff just before Christmas, workers at the B. F. Goodrich Footwear Co. here rejected a company demand for a 92-cent-an-hour cut in wages and benefits.

And while Goodrich scheduled the shutdown of the plant for Dec. 20, the 1,100 members of directly affiliated AFL-CIO Local 21914 voted to contribute $1,000 in support of the General Electric Co. strikers.

Even if the workers had accepted the cutback—66 cents an hour in wages and 26 cents in benefits—there was no real guarantee of job security, said Louis P. Andrew, business agent for the local.

Goodrich has been phasing out operations here for several years, but the company stepped up the timetable for the shutdown when the demand for the wage cuts was rejected.

AFL-CIO Field Rep. Joseph Tomaszek said that Goodrich shifted some of its footwear production to a new plant in Georgia, but made no offers to transfer Watertown workers there.

Goodrich insists that the increasing imports of foreign footwear products caused the shutdown of the Watertown plant, Tomaszek said.

The local had sent a committee to the Goodrich headquarters in Akron, O., urging the company to reconsider the closing of the plant.

But the efforts of the local proved fruitless as the company stuck to its demands that workers accept the wage cut from the current $3.09 an hour to $2.56. It also insisted on cuts in vacations and other benefits.

During peak operations at Watertown several years ago, the plant employed almost 5,800 workers. It now employs 1,165 and all but 175 of the workforce will be laid off by Dec. 20.

The local's current contract with Goodrich would not terminate until next May 20.

Anti-Poverty Program Faces Fight in House

A battle for the survival of the federal anti-poverty program was shaping up in the House, with the key vote expected to come on a conservative-backed proposal to turn most poverty programs over to the states.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, in a letter to all House members, urged support for the legislation approved by the House Education & Labor Committee.

It would extend the Economic Opportunity Act for two years as requested by the Administration. It would also increase the spending ceiling by $295 million for a group of popular and successful programs —Head Start and Follow Through for children, the Mainstream and New Careers programs in the job training fields, and the Emergency Food & Health Service program.

Attacking the state control plan, Biemiller warned that "in many instances, this would mean placing project approval and funding authority in the hands of those most unresponsive to the needs of the inner cities."

Details of the plan to turn OEO programs over to the states were unveiled by Rep. Albert Quie (R-Minn.), Rep. Edith Green (D-Ore.) and four other House members.

It was sharply attacked by the director of OEO, Donald Rumsfeld, a former Republican congressman. Rumsfeld had urged Congress to extend the present law an additional two years and declared that any needed reforms could be accomplished by administrative action.

Democratic leaders postponed floor action on the bill to allow more time to round up votes against the state turnover plan.

House Labor Committee Chairman Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.), who is leading the fight against the Quie-Green substitute, said the outcome will depend on how many Republicans support the Administration on the issue.

The U.S. Conference of Mayors also took a strong position against state control of anti-poverty programs. The mayors issued a statement declaring they were "appalled" at the Quie-Green proposal.

Dwindling IBEW Local Assails Export of Jobs

Chicopee, Mass.—The members of Local 1500 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers have a story to tell.

They're telling it to congressmen, senators, the President of the United States—and to their fellow trade union members.

It's the story of American jobs, paying decent union wages, being transferred to low-wage overseas areas—in this particular case to Taiwan with a wage scale of 81 cents a day and to Portugal where the union reports the work is being done for $1-a-day.

Just two years ago, the local had 3,400 members—2,500 at the F. W. Sickles plant at Chicopee, another 900 at the company's Ludlow, Mass., plant. Both plants were units of the General Instrument Corp.

Local 1500's members worked on the manufacture of television components, industrial components and government contracts.

Today the local is down to 850 members, all at the Chicopee plant. And they're not sure how long their jobs will last. The Ludlow plant is closed down. Also shut down is another General Instrument plant at Woonsocket, R.I., which had employed some 750 workers.

"This decrease in employment," the IBEW local reports, "has been totally attributed to General Instrument Corp.'s policy of turning to overseas manufacturing of products."

The union asks: "Where and when will it stop?"

For the workers who have lost their jobs already, it reports, the alternative is "to turn to low paying jobs or to welfare."

A top company official expresses sympathy, declares that the company was forced into overseas operation by price competition from low-wage areas of the world and said that if the flood of imports could be limited his firm "would be delighted to activate and enlarge our facilities in this country and phase out our offshore facilities."

That's the message the Local 1500 Legislative Action Committee and a special offshore committee is trying to get across in the informational material it is sending out.

Before it's too late.

Crime's Breeding Grounds

UNLESS THE NATION launches a "full-scale war on domestic ills, especially urban ills," its cities will take on the characteristics of fortresses and change into places of terror.

That warning does not come from scare mongers or shrill merchants of cheap thrill literature. It comes from the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence headed by Milton S. Eisenhower, brother of the late president and recently retired as president of Johns Hopkins University.

The commission was appointed in the summer of 1968 by Pres. Lyndon Johnson after the assassination of Sen. Robert F. Kennedy.

In its report it said its gloomy prediction of what will happen to the nation's cities will come to pass unless the country takes "the massive action that seems to be needed" to build the "humane city-societies of which we are capable."

If the nation cannot free itself "from other obligations" quickly enough to turn to massive programs for the cities "we should now legally make the essential commitments and then carry them out as quickly as funds can be obtained," the commission said.

THE LATEST FINDINGS of the commission were based on an extensive detailed national study of crime, especially homicide, assault, rape and robbery. This type of crime, the study showed, is primarily centered in the large cities, is increasingly committed by males between 15 and 24 years of age and stems "disproportionately from the ghetto slums where most Negroes live."

The commission stressed, however that the causes are sociological, not racial:

"When poverty, dilapidated housing, high unemployment, poor education, overpopulation and broken homes are combined, an interrelated complex of powerful criminogenic forces is produced by the ghetto environment."

In addition to the disastrous nature of life in the slums, the commission offered some other "informed judgments" on the reason for the increase in crime:

Rapid social change has led to a "breakdown of traditional social roles and institutional controls over the behavior of young and old alike, but particularly the young."

Law enforcement agencies have not been strengthened sufficiently to cope with the increase in violence.

There has been a breakdown in the public belief, especially in the slums, that rule-making institutions are entitled to rule.

The commission concluded: "Public and private action must guarantee safety, security, and justice for every citizen in our metropolitan areas without sacrificing the quality of life and other values of a free society."

The warning has been clearly sounded. Unless the nation commits itself to pouring massive aid into the cities, into the ghettos, into the legal and judicial systems, the prospect of violence and terror and disruption continues to menace the future.

Viewpoint of Nominee to Court Held Valid Confirmation Issue

By John P. Roche

IN THE DEBATE over the nomination of Clement Haynsworth to the Supreme Court, supporters of the judge constantly argued that it was somehow unconstitutional for the Senate to reject a presidential appointment simply because of his "philosophy."

The Senate's right of review was thus presumably limited to such questions as the existence or non-existence of "conflict of interest" with the implication that a justice with a clean financial blotter, whatever his opinions on key constitutional matters, should sail through.

The U.S. Constitution, in other words, is to be considered "above politics." Supreme Court justices (and judges of the inferior courts), like Plato's philosopher-kings, are to be turned loose in their wisdom unchecked by the other branches of the government (except for the remote threat of impeachment). The meaning of the Constitution, in this view, is self-evident.

Justice Owen J. Roberts gave this concept its classic formulation in 1936 when he wrote for the Supreme Court: "When an act of Congress is challenged . . . as not conforming to the constitutional mandate the judicial branch of the government has only one duty—to lay the article of the Constitution which is invoked beside the statute which is challenged and decide whether the latter squares with the former. . . . This court neither approves nor condemns any legislative policy."

Roberts made American constitutional law a simple exercise in legal mechanics. But the minute you read the Constitution, the trouble begins. Congress is, for example, vested with power over interstate and foreign commerce, but the Founding Fathers never tried to define "commerce." Right now in Chicago a prominent trial hinges on whether Congress has the right to treat someone who goes from one state to another to incite a riot as included in its power over "commerce."

Would the framers of the Constitution approve of this? The question is unanswerable.

Thus the "philosophy" of judicial nominees is a perfectly legitimate source of concern. Once they are installed for life, there are no checks worth discussion. So it makes a great deal of sense—whether one is "conservative" or "liberal"—to make book on how a judge will respond on the critical issues of our time. Particularly since, as Tocqueville remarked over a century ago, every major problem in the United States ends up as a law suit.

THIS WAS TAKEN for granted in the early years of the Republic. Neither Pres. Thomas Jefferson nor his great antagonist (and cousin) Chief Justice John Marshall would for one minute have accepted the absurd notion that the Supreme Court was non-political. For over 30 years, Marshall conducted a superb strategic retreat while Jefferson bitterly denounced his own court appointees for not fighting for Jeffersonian principles.

Later, Pres. Andrew Jackson ran into trouble with the Whig-controlled Senate, which rejected his nomination of Roger B. Taney as associate justice of the Supreme Court. Indeed, Jackson refused to accept the official message from the Senate, announcing he wanted no truck with those "damned scoundrels."

By their lights, the Whigs were certainly right in their assessment of Taney, but when Marshall died, Jackson had the votes to install Taney as chief justice. At this point Daniel Webster and Justice Joseph Story decided the Supreme Court was "gone" and a New York paper described Taney as "unworthy of public confidence, a supple, cringing tool of power."

Our ancestors, in short, played the game hard and straight. If they didn't like a man's "philosophy," they set out to block his appointment. In all candor, this seems far preferable to endless bookkeeping disputes about "conflict of interest" which—in both the Fortas and the Haynsworth cases—disguised a fundamental struggle over constitutional opinions.

Bayard Rustin Says:

GE's Only Offer to Halt Inflation Comes in Sub-Standard Wages

By Bayard Rustin

THIRTEEN UNIONS and 150,000 workers are now on strike against General Electric. If these workers were striking to achieve benefits only for themselves—benefits that are rightfully theirs and long overdue—their struggle would be worth supporting. But the issues in this strike go far beyond the contract that must be negotiated, far beyond even the welfare of the workers and their families.

At stake in the GE strike is the security of every worker in America, black or white, and the future of the collective bargaining process.

The striking unions have taken on a formidable opponent in GE which in the past has used sophisticated anti-union techniques to considerable advantage. By offering benefits to some workers and not to others, by holding separate talks with individual unions, often with each local within a union, and by establishing a national teletype network informing GE central headquarters of each union's every move, thereby enabling the company to plan a coordinated counter-strategy, GE has kept its opposition weak and divided.

But today, unlike in the past, the unions are united (they even have their own teletype network) and have established a coordinated bargaining committee.

Having achieved union solidarity, they must now confront another obstacle—GE's policy of Boulwarism. Originated in 1947 by Lemuel Boulware, the director of employe relations for GE, this policy is at once a challenge to the entire process of collective bargaining and an insult to the dignity of the workers. The company practicing Boulwarism plays the role of a benevolent dictator. The workers in this situation have no rights but only privileges granted from on high. The workers are "privileged" to accept The Offer made by the company whenever a contract must be signed. Indeed, they must accept The Offer for GE will never make another one. Its policy is "take it or leave it."

It is ironic that GE, which is one of the major propagandists for "free enterprise" (its propaganda is pure right-wing vintage) should engage in authoritarian and paternalistic practices which one usually associates with the Soviet Union.

By coincidence, on the very day the strike began, the U.S. Court of Appeals declared Boulwarism an unlawful bargaining practice in that it "amounts to a declaration on the part of the company that not only the union, but the process of collective bargaining itself may be dispensed with."

Despite this decision, GE refuses to budge. Its intransigence remains a threat to its own employes and to workers in other industries where companies might practice their own brand of Boulwarism.

The GE strike is also significant for other workers in that it is a prelude to negotiations in the trucking, meatpacking, rubber, and automobile industries. In all of these negotiations, the companies will be counting on the support of public opinion, and in appealing for this support, they will echo Mr. Nixon's plea to halt inflation, even at the risk of a reaction which will lay off hundreds of thousands of workers.

GE HAS ALREADY made this appeal in advertisements in the national press which warn of "super-inflation" if they give an inch on the unions' wage demands. Since this issue will be with us for some time, let us take a look at what GE has done to control inflation.

Its only contribution to the cause has been to pay its workers well under the going wage in other major industries. The buying power of GE workers has not increased since 1960.

Yet at the same time GE leads all manufacturing companies in after-tax profits. In 1960 GE made 14.3 percent as against 9.2 percent for all manufacturing. In 1968 it was still ahead, 14.8 percent to 12.1 percent. Price-fixing is another aspect of GE's "contribution" to the anti-inflation campaign. In 1961 a federal court found GE guilty of bid-rigging and price-fixing and handed down penalties more severe than had ever been imposed upon a company in an anti-trust case.

The GE strike has posed the issues of justice and injustice with a rare clarity. When all of the company's fatuous rationalizations are set aside, we are faced with a simple conflict between workers demanding respect and a decent wage and a company responding with paternalism and greed.

The workers need and deserve all the support they can get, both moral (public expressions of sympathy) and financial (boycotting GE products). For every American who sincerely desires social equality in this country, the goal of the moment must be a union victory at General Electric.

State Plans Lag:

Federal Plan Held Best Model For Workmen's Compensation

THE FEDERAL EMPLOYES Workmen's Compensation Act is "the best in the country," said social security specialist James O'Brien, who urged Congress to give workers in private industry the same kind of protection from wage loss stemming from on-the-job accidents.

Organized labor's long-range goal is a federal workmen's compensation system, noted O'Brien, an assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security. But, he said, the "immediate objective" is federal minimum standards of eligibility, benefits and coverage that would assure "prompt and adequate wage replacement to victims of work injuries."

Workmen's compensation is the "oldest form of social insurance in the United States," O'Brien noted. But, he stressed, the states, which have exclusive jurisdiction over the systems, have not kept them "geared to the needs of a modern industrial society."

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, O'Brien said that shortcomings in the systems were recognized from the beginning, and the hope was that the states would update and strengthen their laws to make their systems "adequate."

But, he declared, "the state legislatures have been either unable or unwilling to make the changes necessary" to correct those shortcomings, and to keep their systems up to date. As a result, he said, there is no state-to-state uniformity of workmen's compensation. Instead, he noted, there are now 55 entirely different systems—50 state laws, two federal laws, and workmen's compensation laws for Puerto Rico, Guam and the Virgin Islands.

O'BRIEN STRESSED that present state laws vary so widely that "it is not only possible, but it is highly probable" that two employes of the same company, earning the same wage for the same job, who suffer identical injuries in two different states will receive entirely different workmen's compensation insurance payments.

Inadequate compensation is matched by inadequate safety standards, O'Brien said.

Last year, he noted, there were 2.2 million industrial accidents, including 14,300 deaths.

During the year, he added, 250 million man-days were lost due to industrial accidents. Work stoppages during the same period resulted in only 50 million man-days lost.

Reporters questioning O'Brien on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times and Alex Uhl of Press Associates, Inc. The weekly interview is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

By Press Associates, Inc.

THERE ARE TWO SCHOOLS of thought when it comes to the social security system: (1) The program should simply provide "a basic floor of protection" on which retirees can build their own retirement program. (2) The program should provide the basic retirement system by which the elderly can live out their lives in dignity and economic security.

This conflict in the very philosophy of the social security system is the backdrop against which today's varying calls for improvements are being sounded. The conflict is not a simple battle of numbers: it is a conflict of philosophies.

There are those who cling to the concept of keeping the "floor of protection" system. These include conservative members of Congress from both the Republican and Democratic parties and the Nixon Administration itself.

There are those, notably liberal congressmen, organized labor and the National Council of Senior Citizens, who insist that the system must become an adequate retirement system in its own right.

It is for the first reason that Pres. Nixon has limited his proposed increase in benefits to 10 percent—at one point he said 7 percent—plus a cost-of-living adjustment, both of which, however, would represent mere amelioration of benefits rather than a real change in philosophy.

It is for the second reason that the labor movement and the Senior Citizens are calling urgently for a 50 percent increase in benefits over three years and other improvements that would make retirees largely independent of other sources of income in order to live decently.

When the social security program was adopted more than 30 years ago, it more nearly approached its goal of replacing income lost because of retirement, disability or death, than it does today. Originally, the wage base on which benefits were derived was set at $3,000, a figure which took in roughly 96 percent of workers. Today the wage base is $7,800. It should be $15,000 to serve the same purpose as the original $3,000.

As a result the gap between what a worker needed in social security benefits in 1939—somewhat better than 50 percent of wages—and what he needs today in order to maintain an above-poverty level has widened. Instead of "replacing income," it has fallen behind over the years despite increases in benefits.

HOW SERIOUS this has been was brought out in a study by a task force for the Senate's Special Committee on Aging. This study shows that in 1950 the cost of a retired couple's budget for a moderate living standard required about $150 a month. Benefits averaged about $75, or half. Today, the budget for a retired couple is roughly $370 a month while benefits average only about $118 or somewhat less than one-third.

This deterioration has been the source of deep concern to the retiree.

The coming debate on social security improvements will center on the legislation proposed by Rep. Jacob H. Gilbert (D-N.Y.). This bill is being strongly supported by labor and the Senior Citizens. Its greatest merit is that it adopts firmly the philosophy that social security should be the "primary source of economic security." It calls for the kinds of improvements that would attain this goal over the next few years.

In addition to raising benefits to the point where they can answer today's needs, the bill introduces the principle of support of the retirement system through federal funds. In the long run the system would call for one-third support by the government, one-third by employers and one-third by workers.

What has become increasingly clear is that the "floor-of-protection" concept has become increasingly obsolete and that a sharp turn in social security philosophy is now urgently needed. The Gilbert bill will afford an opportunity for Congress and the American people to make that turn.

FULL PROTECTION for workers in private industry—equal to the standards set by the Federal Employes Workmen's Compensation Act—is urged by James O'Brien, assistant director of the federation's Dept. of Social Security. Interviewing O'Brien on Labor News Conference were Alex Uhl, left, of Press Associates, Inc. and Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times, right.

Rail Shopcraft Pact Reached, Strike Averted

the report of a presidential emergency board, the unions were free to strike after 12:01 a.m., Dec. 3.

However, they agreed to withhold strike action on a "moment-to-moment" basis contingent upon progress in bargaining. The tentative agreement was reached on Dec. 4 following an all-night round of negotiations.

Lockout Was Threatened

The unions had indicated they would strike only two or three railroads, if necessary, to avoid a "national emergency." But the carriers threatened to lock out workers on all major railroads if there was any strike at all.

The unions have sought a 10 percent general wage increase, plus 20 cents an hour for skilled workers. This, they said, would bring wages closer to those paid for similar work in other industries.

The unions also asked for interest on deferred payments of increases due, shift differentials and premium pay for Saturday and Sunday work. The carriers offered only a 5 percent general pay boost and demanded numerous rules changes.

Board Heard Case

An emergency board was appointed by Pres. Nixon after the unions set an Oct. 4 strike deadline on six railroads—Santa Fe, Great Northern, Erie-Lackawanna, Illinois Central, Southern, and Chesapeake & Ohio-Baltimore & Ohio—and the carriers threatened to shut down other major railroads.

The board recommended a 5 percent general increase and a separate increase of at least 20 cents an hour for "more skilled" workmen. These total between 15 and 25 percent of the employes represented by the unions.

The board further proposed that the two sides negotiate rules changes to make possible a "special additional wage increase" through gains in efficiency and productivity.

Since the board's report, the four unions have served notices on the railroads for additional wage increases for 1970, 1971 and 1972, plus a cost-of-living "escalator" clause.

Clerks Rebuff Teamster Raid On Airline Unit

Chicago—Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway & Airline Clerks expressed hope that the unaffiliated Teamsters will see "the futility of trying further raids on our union" as the result of a representation election on Western Airlines.

BRAC announced that an attempt to take over its membership by the Teamsters was defeated by a margin of 1,719 to 923 in a National Mediation Board mail ballot election. Employes of the Los Angeles-based airline are scattered through 14 states.

"I hope the Teamsters realize once and for all that BRAC people are just not interested in senseless raiding tactics when they know that their own union is winning record benefits at the bargaining table," Dennis said.

The union said the Teamsters had requested the election while BRAC was in the midst of negotiations, which later brought wage increases averaging 40 percent over three years.

SOCIAL ACTION AWARD of the Association of Catholic Trade Unionists is presented to Pres. David Sullivan of the Service Employes at a dinner in New York City by Terence Cardinal Cooke. Watching is George M. Donahue, left, executive secretary of ACTU. The Msgr. John P. Monaghan award is given annually to a Catholic who has distinguished himself in the field of social action.

Enforcement Powers Pressed for EEOC

The AFL-CIO joined with major civil rights organizations in urging Congress to give the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission power to enforce the law forbidding job discrimination.

Thomas E. Harris, AFL-CIO associate general counsel, and William E. Pollard of the federation's Dept. of Civil Rights, urged a House Labor subcommittee to give the EEOC the same type of enforcement power that the National Labor Relations Board has.

This would enable the commission to issue cease-and-desist orders remedying job discrimination based on race, religion, national origin, sex and age.

They strongly opposed an Administration proposal to require the EEOC to bring suit in federal district court against an employer, union or employment agency accused of discrimination. District courts are the lowest step on the federal judicial ladder and already have heavy backlogs of cases, some of which have been awaiting trial for years.

Harris said the NLRB-type procedure should be even more effective in civil rights cases because employers are unlikely to resort to the extreme delaying tactics and repeated violations which they use to defeat a union organizing campaign.

Enforcement powers for the EEOC, Harris said, would also bring about some improvement in the overlapping jurisdictions of government agencies in dealing with complaints of discrimination.

He stressed that the AFL-CIO has consistently taken the position that fair employment legislation "must apply to unions as well as employers" and Federation Pres. George Meany has testified in favor of strong enforcement powers.

Legislation to give the EEOC power to enforce its findings has been introduced by Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.), who presided at the House hearings.

Film Presents Aldrin's Speech

A 20-minute color film of Col. Edwin Aldrin's address to the AFL-CIO is available from the federation for rent or purchase.

Titled "First Union Man on the Moon," the film was produced by the Machinists. It points up the vast contribution to the nation's space program made by members of many unions — including IAM member Aldrin. His message to the delegates: "The union label means reliability, responsibility, the assurance of the highest quality."

The film, which is intercut with NASA footage of the actual flight and moon-walk, may be rented from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education Film Library for $3 or purchased for $99.

Meany Presents Charter:

Two Bakery Unions Reunited in Merger

for any purpose to be dissolved, terminated or discontinued.

"On the contrary, this agreement is directed to a combination and continuance of two international labor organizations having common interests and united purposes into a single international union."

The convention elected Conway as president of the consolidated union and Kralstein as secretary-treasurer. Also elected under the terms of the merger agreement were the following officers who had been nominated earlier by the ABC and B&C conventions:

From ABC: Executive Vice Presidents John De Concini and Joseph G. Kane; Regional Vice Presidents Kenneth F. McLellan, Peter Pointak, Russell B. Prince, Amos W. Miller, Leroy B. Sweat, Attilio Mascaro and Patrick D'Angelo; General Executive Board Members Harry Lorber, Paul Turlish, Peter Carbonara, M. E. Hollis, Jr., Henry Molloy, Edward Kemmitt and Donald I. Weil.

All those elected from ABC were serving on that union's general board. When it appeared that three veteran members would have to sacrifice their jobs, the ABC convention nominated the three to serve as board members at-large, with the approval of the B&C convention. The three ABC designees are Earl M. Trotter, Robert E. Gregory and Louis Genuth.

Elected from the B&C were: Executive Vice Presidents Gregory Oskoian, Gradon Tetrick; Regional Vice Presidents J. Ray Crocker, Albert C. Meyer, John H. Reid, George Seibold, Gean Triplett, Walter Friese, Gene Montroni; GEB Members Allan Bryan, Fred Cabuzzi, Anthony P. Dolce, Samuel Kroll, Alva Gwathney, A. D. Sagar, Robert Stevens; Board Members at-Large Harold Friedman, Harry Gross, Harry Rubenstein.

At the final ABC convention, De Concini told 400 delegates from 113 local unions:

"We are giving up our name but we are not going to give up the principles on which we were founded—integrity, democracy and militancy in dealing with our employers; fairness and consideration.

"Let's join forces to make this the greatest bakery union of all time."

Teachers Win Major Vote In San Francisco

San Francisco—Public school teachers here voted overwhelmingly for the AFL-CIO Teachers as their bargaining representative in a preference election held by the State Mediation Service.

The vote, which was called for by the city's board of education, was 2,135 for the AFT local, 285 for the unaffiliated Teachers Association of San Francisco, 93 for the California Teachers Association, and 226 for no organization.

The California Teachers Association, a National Education Association affiliate, announced several weeks ago that it did not wish to go on the ballot. However, space was left for writing in CTA.

Pres. James Ballard of AFT Local 61, noting that AFT had challenged NEA to participate in the election, said the results "reveal why they were afraid to get on the ballot." He added, "As for the AFT we shall press forward with our program exactly as we outlined it to teachers."

Plans to End Hunger Vary Widely As White House Conference Opens

Sharp controversy over what should be done and what is being done to end hunger in America emerged in opening sessions of a White House Conference on Food, Nutrition & Health in Washington.

The three-day meeting was attended by 2,500 participants from civil rights and anti-poverty groups, farm organizations, religion, government, business, education and labor.

About 50 participants from labor included representatives of affiliated unions and AFL-CIO departments with concern in the area.

In opening the conference, Pres. Nixon said it "marks the beginning of a new more determined and more concerned drive than ever before, to reduce the malnutrition that derives from ignorance or inadvertance."

He said that while he expected the sessions to bring out "a lively difference of opinions," the holding of the conference at all was a "seal of urgency on our national commitment" to end hunger in America for all time.

"We can argue its extent, but hunger exists," Nixon said. "We can argue its severity, but malnutrition exists. The plain fact is that a great many Americans are not eating well enough to sustain health."

He called upon the conference to support his proposals in Congress for reform in the food stamp program, a federally-guaranteed minimum income of $1,600 per year for a family of four and a commission on population growth.

Nixon told the conference, "I know you take your work seriously, and we are going to take your findings seriously." He said he would call a follow-up conference in a year to see what has been done about implementing recommendations of this conference.

One of the first major panel sessions—on "delivery systems of food and of money for food"—opened with direct criticisms of Nixon for not doing enough to wipe out hunger and malnutrition.

The actual work of the conference began in late summer when 26 advisory panels were organized among 275 conference participants. They drafted preliminary recommendations which were reviewed by eight task forces, using another 300 participants. The task forces then added recommendations of their own.

Conference panels then took up both sets of recommendations in various areas to discuss them, approve them, revise them or throw them out and adopt their own recommendations.

The proposals from each conference panel or "working session" will be the basis of the conference's report to be submitted to Nixon before Christmas

The White House said that "nothing will be watered down for the sake of compromise. Where differences exist, both majority and minority views will be reported."

Dr. Jean Mayer, the President's special consultant on food and a Harvard University professor of nutrition, directed the conference for the White House. He said he expected "a legislative package" to come from the recommendations.

State-County Adds 1,100 in Wisconsin

Madison, Wis.—The State, County & Municipal Employes recently won elections involving more than 1,100 Wisconsin state employes.

Professional and blue-collar workers in the state's Dept. of Natural Resources overwhelmingly chose SCME Wisconsin State Employes Council 24 in two elections conducted by the State Employment Relations Board.

SCME has more than 26,000 members in the state. In the professional unit with 474 eligible, the vote favored the union 255 to 75. Blue-collar employes voted 401 to 35 for the union, with 658 eligible to vote.

Basic Rights Flouted:

ILO Scores Spain On Jailed Unionists

Geneva—Spain's failure to release imprisoned trade unionists was strongly denounced by the worker members of the International Labor Organization's Governing Body at its latest session here.

Jean Moeri, Swiss leader of the workers' group, scored the Franco regime for ignoring the request of a special ILO committee for an amnesty for all prisoners held because of their trade union activities.

"Worse yet," Moeri said, "the Spanish government continues to arrest and otherwise persecute trade unionists and to flout the fundamental right to strike by severely repressing all work stoppages."

Moeri asked on behalf of the workers that developments in Spain be followed closely by all the ILO bodies dealing with trade union rights.

In a written statement to the Governing Body, or executive council made up of 48 labor, government and employer representatives, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions said that new labor legislation introduced by the Spanish government was a "travesty" of the reforms urged by the ILO committee.

This three-member investigating unit called for an amnesty for jailed trade unionists and urged fundamental legislative changes to guarantee the free exercise of trade union and other human rights after an on-the-spot study of the Spanish situation.

Rudolph Faupl, the U.S. worker delegate, told the council that the ILO's money-strapped International Center for Advanced Technical & Vocational Training could not continue to operate on "hope, borrowing, begging and promises."

When this center was established in the Italian industrial city of Turin in 1963 to help developing countries meet their needs in skilled manpower, it was expected that voluntary contributions alone would be sufficient to finance it.

But this expectation has not been fulfilled. For this reason, Faupl said when speaking for the worker group, all of the ILO's 121 member states should "equally share the responsibility" for keeping the center going.

At the suggestion of ILO Dir. Gen. David A. Morse the executive council agreed to postpone a decision on the financial issue until its next session in March in order to give governments more time for study.

Faupl, a Machinists international representative, is worker vice-chairman of the Turin center's board.

In another action, the council appointed AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter Davis to the ILO's panel of consultants on workers' education.

The council voiced unanimous regret at the resignation as a worker delegate of Lord Collison, general secretary of the British agricultural workers union, who has accepted a government appointment in Britain.

Moeri said that Collison, who was made a lifetime peer by the Labor Government, had rendered "tremendous service to workers the world over" during his 15 years of association with the ILO.

As worker vice chairman of the Governing Body, Moeri will attend the official presentation on Dec. 10 to Morse in Oslo of the 1969 Nobel peace prize that was awarded the ILO.

The Swiss trade unionist noted that the award was a recognition of ILO's effort to promote social justice, the "surest guarantee of a lasting world peace."

Service Employes Add New Units

Worcester, Mass.—The Service Employes collected 303 of 366 votes cast in an election to represent 500 workers in the Worcester department of public works. SEIU Local 495 will represent the city employes.

The city also recognized Local 495 to represent 200 more workers, on the basis of a card check, in three other municipal units. They include the Worcester airport workers, city hall custodians and police department custodians.

Living Costs Bring Rise In Poverty Income Level

The continuing rise in the cost of living is making it harder to escape from poverty, and the Labor Dept. has raised its guideline definition of "poor" families and individuals all along the line.

The new poverty yardstick for a family of four is up from $3,300 to $3,600. The level below which a single person is considered poor was raised from $1,600 to $1,800.

These poverty income levels are used by the Labor Dept. and the Office of Economic Opportunity to help determine "disadvantaged individual" eligibility for various manpower programs.

The revised guidelines for annual net income at the poverty level are:

FAMILY SIZE	NONFARM INCOME		FARM INCOME
	New	Old	New	Old
1	$1,800	$1,600	$1,500	$1,100
2	2,400	2,100	2,000	1,500
3	3,000	2,600	2,500	1,800
4	3,600	3,300	3,000	2,300
5	4,200	3,900	3,500	2,800
6	4,800	4,400	4,000	3,100

50TH ANNIVERSARY of Histadrut, Israel's trade union federation, will be celebrated in the United States as well as in Israel. Shown here at a program in New York are Ladies' Garment Workers Pres. Louis Stulberg, civil rights leader Bayard Rustin, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and John F. Henning, former ambassador and Under Secretary of Labor. They addressed the National Committee for Labor Israel and its affiliated American Trade Union Council for Histadrut.

U.S. Labor Reaffirms Its Support As Histadrut Nears 50-Year Mark

New York—American labor reaffirmed its solidarity with Israel's trade union movement during a three-day program here keyed to the approaching 50th anniversary of the founding of Histadrut.

The labor federations of both nations "are as one body in our commitment to human freedom, democracy and social justice," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said.

Kirkland and Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, spoke at a convention luncheon of the National Committee for Labor Israel and its affiliated Trade Union Council for Histadrut. The 1,500 delegates included union leaders from all sections of the United States.

The national committee, only four years younger than Histadrut itself, helps raise funds for social and humanitarian programs. Histadrut, which includes virtually all Israeli workers — Jew and Arab alike—operates health centers, children's villages, vocational training programs and worker-to-worker international assistance programs such as the Afro-Asian Institute.

Kirkland described the AFL-CIO's support for Histadrut and for Israel's independence as part of a continuing worldwide struggle against aggression.

If America were to "drop out" of the defense of freedom anywhere in the world, Kirkland said, it would be proclaiming that the nation's "values and beliefs" are "unworthy of defense."

The "new left" with its "new isolationism" is turning its back on the painful lessons of history, Kirkland said.

Thus, he noted, liberal institutions are being attacked as part of an "establishment" that must be overthrown. This concept, Kirkland suggested, "differs little from one of the mustier relics in the museum of old radicalism—the doctrine of revolutionary defeatism that things have to be made worse before they can get better."

One of the lessons of history, he stressed, "is that if things are made worse, they are likely to become still worse; that from chaos and from the destruction of more or less democratic institutions there will probably emerge, not a New Jerusalem, but an Adolf Hitler—or, in this day, perhaps a George Wallace."

Rustin told the gathering that Israel's ability to maintain democracy despite the strains of being surrounded by hostile nations has encouraged democratic groups in developing nations of Africa beset by military coups and tribal clashes.

The practical help provided by the Afro-Asian Institute, Rustin said, is in the spirit of the teachings of Maimonides, the 12th Century Jewish philosopher, that "the best form of charity is that aid which makes the need for charity unnecessary."

Pres. Louis Stulberg of the Ladies' Garment Workers presided at the luncheon session. An evening Golden Jubilee celebration of Histadrut's anniversary heard John F. Henning, former Under Secretary of Labor and Ambassador to New Zealand, at a program chaired by economist Leon H. Keyserling, president of the National Committee for Labor Israel.

In a message to the delegates, Pres. Nixon praised Histadrut for its educational, health and welfare programs "to assist workers, young people and new immigrants."

At the annual conference of the American Trade Union Council for Histadrut, Chairman Sol C. Chaiken and Executive Dir. Gregory J. Bardacke reported on establishment of new local and state councils, sponsorship of scholarships to the Afro-Asian Institute, educational programs and seminars, demonstrations and fund-raising activities.

A policy resolution adopted by the trade union delegates expressed "profound appreciation and gratitude for the friendship and solidarity manifested by organized labor of the United States and Canada towards the State of Israel and its people."

Success in Viet Nam Keyed to Social Gains

New York—Military power by itself will not defeat communism in South Viet Nam, Pres. Tran Quoc Buu of the Vietnamese Confederation of Labor (CVT) told a gathering of New York union representatives.

The military effort must be accompanied by specific social programs to improve the lot of South Viet Nam's people, he said at a luncheon sponsored by the League for Industrial Democracy.

Social progress is vital, Buu said, because the Communists themselves are not solely relying on their military and terrorist activities.

They have developed political techniques to exploit the need for programs to benefit the masses and "take advantage of the lack of political organizations among them," he explained.

To meet this situation, Buu said, CVT is organizing a new political party of peasants and workers. Participation in the party will in no way interfere with CVT's strictly separate functions as a labor movement, he said.

Honored with Buu at the luncheon was Nguyen Van Thang, assistant to Buu and director of the confederation's department of international affairs.

In introducing Buu, Thomas Kahn, the league's executive director, deplored the "narrowness of the Viet Nam debate," which focuses on whether the United States should stay in or get out of South Viet Nam and ignores the forces for democratic development there.

Buu, who received a standing ovation from the luncheon audience, said he was "deeply touched by your warm demonstration of solidarity," and praised the league for inviting him to speak.

Personal Exemption Raised:

Tax Relief Provision Improved by Senate

to deduct $1,400 from their tax bill if they spend $20,000 or more on new equipment or facilities.

The loss to the Treasury in tax revenue from the Senate amendment is estimated at $720 million a year.

The Senate confirmed the compromise cut in the oil depletion allowance which had been recommended by its Finance Committee —from the present 27.5 percent to 23 percent.

First it voted 62-30 against an amendment by Sen. Allen J. Ellender (D-La.) to keep the depletion allowance at 27.5 percent.

Then it rejected, 52-38, an amendment by Sen. John J. Williams (R-Del.) to cut the allowance to the 20 percent voted by the House last August.

During the debate, Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) termed the depletion allowance "the most notorious of all loopholes" and said it resulted in the oil industry paying taxes at a rate of only 7.7 percent of its profits as compared with the 43 percent paid by other industries.

A House-Senate conference committee will eventually decide whether the depletion allowance should be cut to the 20 percent in the House bill, the 23 percent in the Senate bill or, as is often the case, some point in between.

It also will have to tackle the differing tax cut provisions of the two bills and a host of other differences in the House and Senate versions.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, the Senate had not yet acted on a number of amendments to tighten loopholes further than its Finance Committee proposed.

The AFL-CIO's letter to senators urged approval of a number of strengthening amendments, including a stricter capital gains tax, restoration of a House-passed tax on financial institutions, a limit on tax deductions that can be claimed by persons with substantial tax-exempt income and other loophole-closers.

The federation called for defeat of a new amendment proposed by Sen. Paul J. Fannin (R-Ariz.) aimed primarily at unions, but covering all organizations engaged in voter registration or any phase of political participation.

According to press reports, Fannin hopes that a "backlash" of resentment against the AFL-CIO for battling against confirmation of Judge Haynsworth to the Supreme Court will bring votes to his side.

His original proposal, defeated in committee, would have denied tax-exempt status to unions that "directly or indirectly" engage in political action or support candidates.

Fannin's latest amendment would cover any organization that used its funds to support or oppose any candidate or to carry on voter registration.

Over the vigorous opposition of Sen. Herman E. Talmadge (D-Ga.) and most other southerners, the Senate approved, 52-36, an amendment permitting tax-exempt foundations to finance non-partisan voter registration drives that are conducted in more than one state.

This would permit continuation of Negro registration drives in the South by such groups as the Southern Regional Council.

The battle over the tax cut portions of the Senate bill found the Republicans sharply divided over strategy and the Democrats virtually unanimous.

The White House and the Treasury Dept. sharply opposed any increase in the personal exemption and said Gore's proposal was "too early and too generous." By too early, the Administration meant that tax relief should be postponed several years in the hope that the added tax revenue would reduce inflationary pressures.

Senate Republican Leader Hugh Scott (Pa.) initially backed the Gore proposal, but later switched to a substitute plan by Sen. Charles H. Percy (R-Ill.) which would have increased the personal exemption by $50 a year until it reached $800. It also included some rate cuts and in the long run would have been more costly than the Gore proposal.

Before the showdown votes, however, Percy had dropped the final amount of his personal exemption proposal to $750.

The Administration was reported willing to accept the Percy plan if the Senate insisted on raising the personal exemption, but it did not make any push to round up support for it.

The result was that the Senate first beat the Percy substitute, 72-23, with as many Republicans voting against it as for it. Then it passed the $800 Gore amendment with 48 Democrats and 10 Republicans in favor, and 32 Republicans and only five Democrats opposed. Among the Democratic opponents was Senate Finance Committee Chairman Russell B. Long (La.).

In the aftermath of the vote, Scott blamed the Administration for not having supported the Percy amendment when it was obvious the Senate wanted to raise personal exemptions.

"I do hope," the Republican leader said, "that responsible officials in the Treasury of my own Administration will listen when next time we advise them that we understand more about strategy than they do."

Later, Sen. Howard Baker (R-Tenn.), who unsuccessfully ran against Scott for the Senate GOP leadership, chided him for "washing dirty linen in public." He said Scott should have stuck with the original Administration position which opposed any increase in personal deductions.

Scott had the last word, however. He noted that Baker was one of the 10 Republicans who ended up voting for the Gore amendment.

SETTLEMENT OF THE STRIKE by Musician's Local 161-170 against the Washington National Symphony was marked by ceremonies in which Mayor Walter E. Washington presented letters of appreciation to a fact-finding panel in the dispute and praised both sides. From left, Charles Sturgis of the local's executive board; Local Sec. J. Martin Emerson; Milton C. Denbo, National Symphony Association attorney; Local Pres. Sam Jack Kaufman; Richard H. Wangerin, a panel member; Association Pres. Lloyd Symington; David L. House Backs Nixon Goals In Viet Nam

The House voted overwhelmingly—335 to 55—for a resolution affirming its "support for the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Viet Nam."

In telegrams to House leaders before the vote, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany expressed the federation's strong support.

He said the Viet Nam policies it endorses "closely parallel those the AFL-CIO has adopted in convention resolutions and Executive Council statements. We strongly urge its adoption."

The resolution also:

- Called attention "to the numerous peaceful overtures" the United States has made to North Viet Nam in an effort to achieve a settlement.
- Endorsed Pres. Nixon's call that the people of South Viet Nam be allowed to choose their own government in a free election open to all and supervised by an impartial, international body.
- Reiterated the willingness of the United States to accept the result of such an election and called on North Viet Nam to do likewise.
- Asked the President to continue to press North Viet Nam to abide by the Geneva convention in treatment of prisoners of war.

Several House members who voted for the resolution stressed they were not giving a "blank check" endorsement to the President on Viet Nam. But the House decisively defeated an attempt to open up the resolution for amendments.

Congress Urged to Fund Vital Social Programs

Labor prodded Congress to narrow the gap between legislative promise and performance by appropriating the money needed to carry out important domestic programs.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller urged a Senate Appropriations subcommittee to increase funds for major programs of the Labor Dept. and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare above the amounts voted by the House and budgeted by the Administration.

His testimony, presented by Legislative Rep. Richard Warden, expressed the AFL-CIO's disappointment that "far-reaching and vital programs" enacted by Congress with labor's strong support have never been adequately funded.

The laws Congress passed promised "great strides toward overcoming some of the important problems facing our nation," Biemiller said. He added:

"Most Americans have believed that when Congress enacted a far-reaching bill, promising funding at a certain level, it meant what it said. Unfortunately, as experience has taught us, authorizations and appropriations are two different worlds; and too often the two seem unrelated.

"In too many of our domestic programs—programs which have contributed to rising expectations among less fortunate Americans—the gap between the flowing promises of authorizations and the performance of appropriations has become increasingly wide."

Biemiller praised the action of the House in boosting funds for education programs, and expressed regret that the same approach wasn't taken in needed health, manpower training, welfare and other programs.

But even in education, he said, the increase still leaves a billion dollar gap between the appropriations and the amount authorized to be spent. He urged the Senate to close the gap further.

The AFL-CIO statement, including a supplemental 32-page analysis, called for an increase of at least one-third for the Labor Dept.'s wage-hour enforcement program.

It urged more money for apprenticeship programs and funds for a study of seasonality problems in the construction industry.

The federation called for a major increase in the occupational health and safety program, urging 100 additional inspectors to protect the safety and health of nearly 27 million workers covered by the Walsh-Healey and McNamara-O'Hara Acts.

Added funds were also sought for independent agencies covered by the same appropriations bill, including the National Labor Relations Board and the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Biemiller also urged the Senate to delete a legislative rider added by the House which would restrict the government's ability to act against illegal school segregation.

British Ground National Jet on Publicity Hop

A National Airline DC-8 that arrived in England for a press demonstration flight to ballyhoo the carrier's plans for Miami-to-London service, Jan. 1, remains grounded at a London airport.

The reason is a simple one: British air transport workers have refused to refuel or service the plane as a measure of support for the Machinists, in their long dispute with National.

The British workers have boycotted (or "blacked" as they put it) National because it locked out more than 1,000 IAM mechanics last Jan. 21 and is now fighting a court order to return them to work.

Meanwhile, Gen. Sec. C. H. Blyth of the International Transport Workers Federation, headquartered in London, has received a cable from IAM Pres. Floyd E. Smith expressing his union's "deep appreciation and heartfelt thanks" for the boycott action.

He said it will hasten a just settlement.

15% Social Security Hike, Tax Relief Draw Nixon Ire

Conference To Iron Out Reform Bill

With a presidential veto threat hanging over its head, a House-Senate conference committee will try to reshape the nation's tax laws.

The final Senate version of the bill, after three weeks of debate and amendments, provided substantial tax relief for low and middle-income Americans but left largely intact a number of tax loopholes and opened several new ones.

It was the tax relief provisions, however, which drew the President's ire at a televised news conference.

The Administration has charged that the Senate provision raising the $600 personal tax exemption to $800 over a two-year period would be "inflationary."

And Mr. Nixon gave a blunt, one-word reply—"No"—when a reporter asked:

"If the final version of the tax reform bill now pending in Congress includes the Senate-adopted $800 exemption and the 15 percent social security increase, can you sign it?"

The veto threat was sharply criticized by Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield.

"The President seems to have gone out of his way to criticize two of the most important provisions of the bill," Mansfield said. Both the higher personal exemption and the social security increase "are fiscally sound" and would help "the people most in need."

Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.), who sponsored the $800 exemption said its cost to the government would be $100 million a year less than

YULE SEASON SHOPPERS are greeted by an informational picket outside a Baltimore department store alerting them to anti-labor tactics of the General Electric Co. as the consumer boycott against GE entered a new week. Similar picketing is being conducted across the country by strikers and union volunteers. (More photos of General Electric boycott activity on Page 5.)

IUE Hits GE Charges:

Strike in 7th Week As Boycott Mounts

Labor's boycott of General Electric products mounted steadily in scope and intensity as union members carried the "Don't Buy" drive into every nook and corner of the country.

State and city central bodies and individual unions organized boycott picketing and distribution of millions of leaflets at hundreds of retail outlets—wherever GE, Hotpoint and Universal products are sold.

The boycott activity attested to the firm support by the entire labor movement for the 150,000 members of 13 unions engaged in the strike against the nation's largest and wealthiest electrical corporation.

Other evidence of all labor's involvement in the struggle came in the form of contributions to the GE Strike Relief Fund which AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said continues to mount after passing the million-dollar mark last week.

Meanwhile, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, backed by the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee, recessed negotiations with GE on grounds continued meetings would be a "hoax . . . creating the false illusion" that real bargaining is going on.

John Shambo, chairman of the union's negotiating committee, noted that the company had described an offer made Dec. 6 as the "maximum" with no room for further compromise.

Under these circumstances, Shambo wrote GE's chief negotiator, John Baldwin, further meetings would serve no purpose.

Improved Benefits Seen Sure of Okay

Congress moved towards almost certain approval of a 15 percent across-the-board increase in social security benefits, either through "stopgap" legislation cleared for a vote in the House or through amendments written into the tax bill by the Senate.

The House Ways & Means Committee has already unanimously approved a 15 percent benefit hike and the bill will be taken up under a no-amendment procedure.

The committee said the need for an immediate increase to compensate for higher living costs is "pressing and urgent." Republicans joined with Democrats in voting for a 15 percent hike, effective Jan. 1, in preference to the 10 percent increase next March which the Administration had proposed.

There is a sufficient surplus in the social security trust fund to cover the full cost of the 15 percent boost, the committee said. It pledged to consider a comprehensive overhaul of the social security system as its "first order of business" in the January session.

Rep. Jacob H. Gilbert (D-N.Y.), sponsor of a labor-supported bill providing substantially higher increases and other major social security improvements, backed the 15 percent bill as a needed "stopgap." He said the committee, of which he is a member, will be considering his proposals as part of the "comprehensive review" of the program.

The Senate jumped the gun on the House and included an even bigger benefit package as an amendment to the tax reform bill.

It added to the basic 15 percent

Work Force Decline Cuts Jobless Rate

By Duane Emme

The national unemployment rate dropped sharply in November, but not because of any new surge in the country's lagging job growth, the Labor Dept. reported.

A decline of five-tenths of 1 percent in the jobless rate to 3.4 percent was due mainly to workers leaving the labor force, said Howard Stambler, chief employment analyst for the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The workers who apparently gave up trying to find steady jobs were identified as being mostly teenagers, adult women, men in the 20-to-24 age bracket and part-time workers.

The civilian labor force, which has been "sluggish" but growing slightly in recent months, declined by 191,000 to 81.3 million after seasonal adjustment, BLS said.

On the jobs side, non-farm pay-

Labor Studies Center Holds First Classes

The AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center moved into operation with an initial five-day session on "Critical Problems in State Government."

Keynoting the event was Andrew J. Biemiller, director of the federation's Dept. of Legislation, who described to the class of state central body officers and staff the development of various state legislatures.

Biemiller and subsequent speakers emphasized the importance to the labor lobbyist of knowing the rules of each state's legislature in order to operate effectively.

Biemiller's perspective was historical while Rep. Phillip Burton (D-Calif.) offered specifics on getting bills on the calendar, pressure points in legislative committees, and the role of the executive in respect to the legislature.

Plan to Muzzle Unions Crushed by 59-27 Vote

The Senate rejected by a crushing 59-27 majority an anti-union amendment to the tax bill sponsored by Sen. Paul J. Fannin (R-Ariz.) and blessed by the open shop National Right to Work Committee in full-page newspaper advertisements.

If the amendment had passed, unions and other non-profit organizations which "directly or indirectly" supported or opposed candidates for public office would have been penalized by loss of their tax-exempt status.

The penalty would have been imposed even for carrying on a nonpartisan voter registration campaign—a provision which would have struck at such organizations as the League of Women Voters.

The original version of Fannin's amendment was restricted entirely to unions and the Arizona senator and his supporters made it clear in the debate that the labor movement was still the prime target.

With Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) leading the fight against it, 42 Democrats and 17 Republicans voted to reject the Fannin amendment. Voting for it were 18 Republicans and nine Democrats.

Earlier, Sen. Herman E. Talmadge (D-Ga.) sought to substitute a more limited restriction, contending that the sweeping Fannin

CANAL ZONE UNIONISTS are briefed on the federal government's labor relations policies by Otto Pragan of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education at the first bargaining institute held in the zone.

For 40,000 Workers:

Shopcrafts Contract Sets 68-Cent Raise

About 40,000 railroad workers in four shopcraft unions will receive wage increases in 1969 and 1970 totaling 68 cents an hour upon ratification of a new two-year contract, the unions' leaders announced.

Another 8,000 members of the unions, in less skilled jobs, will get total boosts that are slightly less than that amount. Back pay, among all 48,000 workers, will range from $350 to $400.

Terms of the settlement that averted a possible nationwide shutdown of railroad service were set forth in letters sent to general chairmen in the Machinists, Boilermakers, Sheet Metal Workers and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The general chairmen in turn presented the proposed agreement to union lodges on 76 major railroads for ratification. The vote is expected to be completed by Dec. 16.

The increases for the 40,000 workers who are journeymen in their crafts mean that their current pay scale will go from $3.60 an hour to $4 when the contract is ratified and rise to $4.29 on Aug. 1, 1970.

These are details of the wage package:

All workers will get a 2 percent increase retroactive to the first of the year, 3 percent retroactive to July 1, and 10 cents an hour retroactive to Sept. 1. Journeymen will get an added 5 cents retroactive to July 1 and 7 cents effective when the contract is ratified.

In 1970, all shopmen represented by the unions will get a 5 percent increase on Jan. 1 and 4-cent-an-hour raises on Apr. 1 and Aug. 1.

The agreement also provides that:

- Doubletime rates be paid shopmen for the seventh consecutive day worked.
- The requirement of 16 hours notice of reduction in force be eliminated only in case of "acts of God" or strikes and that in those cases anyone not previously notified who reports to work gets 4 hours call-in pay.
- There may be limited crossing of craft lines to permit "incidental" work at repair-work locations not designated as outlying points. "Incidental" is defined as not comprising a preponderant part of the total work involved in an assignment.
- A two-year moratorium be applied to a 1964 agreement between the unions and the railroads on contracting out of work, provided that the issue is settled in negotiations now underway on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad.

The agreement was reached in lengthy negotiations conducted at the Labor Dept. It resolves a wage dispute between the unions and the railroads going back more than a year.

The unions had sought a 10 percent general increase, plus 20 cents an hour for skilled workers. The carriers offered only a 5 percent general pay boost and demanded numerous rules changes.

A presidential emergency board recommended a 5 percent general increase and a separate increase of 20 cents an hour for "more skilled" employes. However, its skill definition would have applied to not more than 25 percent of the workers.

The unions had indicated they would strike two or three railroads, if necessary to reach a settlement, once they were free to strike under the terms of Railway Labor Act. They said such action would avoid a "national emergency." However, the carriers threatened a lockout on all major railroads if there were any strike at all.

IAM Vice Pres. William Winpisinger, spokesman for the unions during the dispute, said that while the shopcrafts "didn't achieve every goal, we did hit some milestones." He said the settlement's wage terms were better than the unions had thought possible of achievement without a strike.

Status Quo Rule Upheld In Railroad Negotiations

The Railway Labor Act's requirement that management and labor keep the status quo while negotiating on job conditions applies even to conditions not covered by written rules, the U.S. Supreme Court has decided.

The decision came in litigation involving the Detroit & Toledo Shore Line Railroad, the United Transportation Union and the former Firemen & Enginemen, which became part of the UTU on Jan. 1, 1969.

The case arose from a dispute going back to February 1961 when the carrier notified the Firemen it was unilaterally moving a reporting point for train and engine crews from its Lang Yard in Toledo, O., to Trenton, Mich., 35 miles away.

After failing to get a special board to rule against the proposed action, the Firemen served a bargaining notice under the law to amend an agreement to halt the move.

While mediation was in process, the railroad posted a bulletin creating the new reporting point in Trenton. The union threatened to strike. The carrier went to court for an injunction against the strike and the Firemen counterclaimed for an injunction to prevent the shift to Trenton.

The U.S. District Court of Northern Ohio dismissed the railroad's complaint and granted the union's injunction. The 6th Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the trial court.

Supreme Court Justice Hugo Black, writing for the court majority, said what must be preserved as a status quo while exhausting the law's procedures "are the actual objective working conditions out of which the dispute arose, irrespective of whether these conditions are covered in an existing agreement."

"The act's status quo requirement is central to its design," he said. "Its immediate effect is to prevent the union from striking and management from doing anything that would justify the strike."

Chief Justice Warren E. Burger, participating in his first decision in a labor case on the court, joined Justice John M. Harlan in a partial dissent.

They did not argue with applying the status quo to conditions not covered by agreements if the conditions have a history of being well established. In this proceeding, they said, the case should be remanded to determine if that was the situation.

In another decision, the Supreme Court reversed the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals to decide 5-3 that injuries to longshoremen occurring on piers affixed permanently to land are not compensable under the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act.

Canal Zone Unions Focus On Bargaining

Canal Zone, Panama—The first collective bargaining institute conducted here by AFL-CIO education specialists was attended by 59 representatives of the almost 15,000 government workers in the zone.

The federal government is virtually the sole employer in the zone and the institute focused on the effects Pres. Nixon's new Executive Order 11491 will have on the labor relations of government workers.

Aspects of Panamanian labor law were presented by Jose A. Campos, president of Panama's Superior Tribunal of Labor. Although the workers are not covered by Panamanian labor laws, the future operations of organized labor could be vitally affected if and when the canal is turned over to Panama.

Of the 15,000 government workers, 13,000 are union members and 11,000 of these are Panamanian nationals. The remainder are American citizens.

Sessions during the six-day institute also stressed greater cooperation among the 13 AFL-CIO affiliates and the improvement of relations among all union members.

Key speakers included Otto Pragan of the federation's Dept. of Education, Paul Hutchings of the Metal Trades Dept., Arthur Kane, education director of the Government Employes, and James O'Donnell, education committee chairman of the Canal Zone AFL-CIO.

The 13 unions participating in the institute were the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the State, County & Municipal Employes, National Maritime Union, Government Employes, Machinists, Masters, Mates & Pilots, Boilermakers, Marine Engineers, Maintenance of Way Employes, Fire Fighters, Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, Operating Engineers and the Communications Workers.

Child Labor Abuses Found In 11,000 Cases

Federal wage-hour investigators found 11,273 children illegally employed during the 1969 fiscal year, some of them in hazardous occupations with high accident rates.

The investigations, which reached only a small portion of establishments covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act, turned up 10,024 under-age youngsters employed in non-farm establishments and 1,249 children illegally employed on farms.

Of the non-farm group, 5,234 were 16 or 17-year-olds working at hazardous jobs where the minimum employment age is 18.

The remaining 4,790 were under the minimum age of 16 for full-time employment in non-hazardous jobs or under the age 14 minimum for employment outside of school hours in permitted occupations.

On the farms, the violations were found equally among children of migrant workers and local farm children.

Forty-seven percent of the children found working on farms during school hours were in the 10-13 age bracket, 38 percent were 14 or 15, and 15 percent were under the age of 10.

A majority of the children illegally employed on farms—59 percent—were enrolled in school grades below normal for their age. The percentage of children below their grade level soared to 72 percent for migrant children.

Robert J. Brown Named U.S. Manpower Official

Robert J. Brown has been named associate manpower administrator of the U.S. Training & Employment Service by Labor Sec. George P. Shultz. Brown served as commissioner of the Minnesota Employment Security Dept. until he joined the Labor Dept. in 1966.

Keenan Reappointed To Red Cross Post

Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers has been reappointed vice chairman for labor for the 1970 American Red Cross drive for members and funds.

The reappointment of Keenan, an AFL-CIO vice president, was announced in Washington by the 1970 campaign's co-chairmen: Frederick R. Kappel, retired chairman of American Telephone & Telegraph's board, and Harold Boeschenstein, board chairman of Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp.

Soviet Role in Mideast Seen Threat to Peace

Tel Aviv, Israel—There can never be a permanent peace in the Middle East based on the belief that Communist Russia can play a role as a peacemaker, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Thomas W. Gleason warned here.

Gleason, who is president of the Longshoremen, brought "warm greetings" to the 11th convention of Histadrut, Israel's labor movement, from American labor. He was one of the convention's invited speakers.

Russia is as "hypocritical" when it talks about peace in the Middle East, Gleason emphasized, as when it "talks about protecting Czechoslovakia by invading and occupying this small country and stifling its cry for freedom."

Further, he asked: How can Russia be a peacemaker when it has recently shipped more than $2 billion in weapons to Nasser, Egypt's dictator who "never gets tired of boasting about his preparations for destroying Israel?"

Gleason told the delegates that the bonds of friendship between the AFL-CIO and Histadrut have been "forged in nearly 50 years of tough struggles for our common democratic aims."

Similarly, he added, "these bonds have been firmed in years of battle against our common enemy—the enemy of peace and freedom everywhere."

Gleason took the opportunity to thank Israeli Prime Minister Golda Meir for a "stirring" address to the AFL-CIO convention in October. "Not only the people of Israel, but liberty-loving people everywhere can be truly proud of this great lady," he said.

He noted that the AFL-CIO convention had called upon the U.S. government to "provide Israel with economic assistance to help her carry the enormous burden on her economy as a result of the continued hostility by the Arabs."

Pres. Nixon and our government, he noted, also were urged to supply Israel with "the means with which to defend herself and prevent another war which might lead to a world conflagration."

This stand was taken by American labor, Gleason said, "because we believe in peace with freedom, because we want to see democracy secure and prosperous in your country, in our country, in Arab countries, throughout the world."

"This is what I mean when I say to you, Shalom," he concluded.

Effective Organizing Stressed:

Merger of Bakery Unions Hailed as Gain for All Labor

Miami Beach—AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany warmly welcomed the newly consolidated Bakery & Confectionery Workers International Union as a part of the federation and presented it with its first assignment—enlisting every member in support of the General Electric strike and the boycott of all GE products until a fair contract is won.

Meany said that formation of the new union with an honored old name is "good news for the trade union movement, though it may be bad news for those employers who follow a policy of divide and conquer." He spoke at the first constitutional convention of the 150,000-member union affiliate—an amalgamation of the AFL-CIO American Bakery & Confectionery Workers and the Bakery & Confectionery Workers, a pioneer affiliate of the former AFL.

The latter union was unaffiliated for 12 years following its expulsion by the 1957 AFL-CIO convention for domination by corrupt leadership. The removal of that leadership opened the way to reconciliation and readmittance.

Recalling that the Bakers' union has a "long and honored history as part of the trade union movement," Meany said it was appropriate to preserve the name of the B&C, originally chartered in 1887.

The B&C, Meany related, can trace its beginning to a successful strike by German bakers in New York City in 1880. The strikers formed a conference, followed by a convention in Pittsburgh of 20 delegates from 17 local unions. That was in 1886, and the following year the AFL issued a charter of affiliation of the Journeymen Bakers National Union of the United States.

In 1904 the union changed its name to the Bakery & Confectionery Workers. Meany recalled that a group of New York bakers formed a "factory" union in 1913, seceded from B&C the same year, but returned in a 1935 merger.

United labor has a job to do, and the B&C can help tremendously in that job, the AFL-CIO president stressed. He named some of labor's goals—fair and equal treatment of all taxpayers, more adequate purchasing power for employes, industrial safety, an end to the "constant gypping of the public" in the marketplace, minimum wages of more than $2 an hour, and a fair settlement for GE strikers.

"We have made up our minds," Meany declared, "that these workers are not going to be beaten into submission" by an arrogant, law-breaking corporation.

"We are asking everyone to contribute at least $1. We have launched a national boycott. We are sure we are going to win this fight."

"There is no more important task that we face than this," Meany declared. "It is not too much to say that the very future of collective bargaining is at stake.

"Because if GE can nullify the labor act" by refusing to bargain in good faith, "every other large corporation can do it."

He exhorted the delegates—694 men and women from 224 local unions: "When you go forth reunited, you go with the opportunity to serve the workers in your industry" and to "play your full and complete part in all the work" of the AFL-CIO.

Earlier the convention elected Daniel E. Conway as president of the consolidated union, Max Kralstein as secretary-treasurer, and 38 other men as vice presidents and general board members. Conway is a former B&C director of organization who had headed the ABC since its founding. Kralstein was B&C president.

The new board is composed of 40 members—20 from ABC and 20 from the former B&C. They were given the oath of office for a five-year term by Wesley Reedy, assistant to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and member of Philadelphia Local 6.

In accepting, Conway assured Meany of the union's strong support of GE strikers and other labor goals. Noting that the reconstituted union now has a large staff of organizers, Conway promised, "We are going to launch the damndest organizing campaign this bakery and confectionery industry has ever seen." The delegates roared their approval.

After ratifying merger terms, the convention adopted a new constitution, including a per capita rate of $1.75 a month, up from the ABC rate of $1.50 and B&C's $1.25 rate.

The delegates authorized the executive board to establish a single system of records, instead of two; approved the boycott of California grapes and GE products, endorsed the legislative program of the AFL-CIO; called for the continued unity of labor, liberal and civil rights forces; authorized consolidation of the unions' scholarship programs, and urged all local unions to affiliate with city, state and provincial central bodies and union label trades councils.

Kirkland assured the delegates, "Now you're ready to carry out the jobs this union was born to do—organize the unorganized and advance the wages and working conditions of your members."

William F. Schnitzler, retired AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer who formerly was B&C president, told the delegates, "It is fitting and proper that you're here, because you belong together. . . . The future is yours."

FEDERATION CHARTER is presented by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the newly merged Bakery & Confectionery Workers in Miami Beach. Pres. Daniel E. Conway, left, watches as Sec.-Treas. Max Kralstein accepts the charter. Kralstein headed the unaffiliated bakery union which united with the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers.

Labor Dept. to Expand Job Banks to 55 Cities

The national computerized job bank program will be expanded to 55 major cities in the current fiscal year instead of the 36 originally planned, Labor Sec. George P. Shultz announced.

Seven job banks are already in service in Baltimore, Chicago, St. Louis, Portland, Ore., Seattle, Hartford, Conn., and Washington, D.C. Another seven will soon be operational in Minneapolis, Atlanta, San Diego, Phoenix, Denver, Pittsburgh and Columbus, Ohio.

Twenty-two more are in the planning stage and Shultz has designated 16 additional cities for job bank operations.

The job bank system uses a daily up-to-date computerized list of available jobs in a major metropolitan area in an effort to quickly place the disadvantaged or unemployed worker in the job opening.

"It represents a major innovation in the operating methods of public employment service and promises to improve considerably the process for which the job-seekers and jobs are matched," Shultz said.

Job bank cities now in the planning stage are Anaheim, Calif., Boston, Buffalo, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Dallas, Detroit, Houston, Indianapolis, Kansas City, Los Angeles, Miami, Milwaukee, New Orleans, New York, Newark, Paterson, Philadelphia, San Bernardino, Oakland, San Jose and Tampa.

The newly designated cities are Providence, Wilmington, Charleston, W.Va., Birmingham, Louisville, Memphis, Little Rock, Albuquerque, Oklahoma City, Des Moines, Wichita, Omaha, Honolulu, San Antonio, Tacoma and San Juan, P.R.

Three more cities will be named soon in Virginia, North Carolina and South Carolina, the Labor Dept. said.

Eventually, the city Job Banks will become a part of a fully automated statewide job matching system such as those operating on an experimental level in Wisconsin, California, Utah and New York. Florida and Michigan have systems in the planning stage.

Serves 150,000

Labor Force Dropouts Cause Jobless Rate Dip

roll employment decreased in November by about 21,000 seasonally adjusted to 70.6 million. There would have been a modest increase except for workers on strike, the government said.

"There is a continued slowdown in employment growth," Stambler said. He noted that monthly payroll employment gains have averaged only 80,000 since June compared to a 240,000 average for the seven months preceding June.

Employment in manufacturing declined slightly between October and November, even after allowing for new strike activity including the walkout of 150,000 workers at General Electric.

Small Increases

There were only small gains in jobs in contract construction; transportation and public utilities; wholesale and retail trade; finance, insurance and real estate; services and government.

The number of unemployed was about 2.8 million seasonally adjusted in November, with a 360,000 decline coming almost wholly among those who dropped out of the labor force.

The overall November jobless rate of 3.4 percent marked a return to the August level, after the rate reached its highest peak in two years in September and remained there in October. Last month's rate was the same as in November 1968.

Jobless rates fell from 13 to 11.6 percent for teenagers, from 6.5 to 5.3 percent for young adult men, and from 4 to 3.5 percent for adult women.

However, BLS noted that key jobless rates for blue-collar workers (4.2 percent) and for workers in manufacturing (3.8 percent) were unchanged between October and November. These rates have been rising since spring.

Unemployment rates for white workers (3.1 percent) and Negro workers (6.2 percent) were both down from October. But both rates were still slightly higher than they were earlier this year.

Another area of BLS's monthly report showed a continued drag in the workweek and earnings, which the government also has cited as evidence of a slowdown in the economy.

The seasonally adjusted average workweek for rank-and-file workers was unchanged at 37.6 hours in November, after falling by two-tenths of an hour in October. The figure was at its lowest level since late 1968.

In manufacturing, the average workweek was unchanged at 40.5 hours following a three-tenths of an hour decline in October. The manufacturing workweek was at its lowest mark in more than 1.5 years, with the exception of February 1969.

Overtime hours in manufacturing dropped for the second straight month, edging down one-tenth of an hour to 3.4 hours a week in November. With the exception of April 1968, when hours were affected by civil disturbances, factory overtime was at its lowest point in two years.

Average hourly earnings for rank-and-file workers were unchanged in November at $3.11. However, because of the decline in overtime, average weekly earnings fell by 62 cents to $116.63. Sharp earnings' drops in construction and trade more than offset slight gains in manufacturing and finance.

Supreme Court Rejects Appeal By Teachers

The U.S. Supreme Court has rejected an appeal of the United Federation of Teachers—Local 2 of the American Federation of Teachers—and its president, Albert Shanker, growing out of 1968 New York school strikes.

After the teachers stopped work in protest against layoffs and harassment in a Brooklyn school district, Shanker was sentenced to 15 days in prison and fined $250 while the union was fined $220,000.

The sentences were imposed under New York's Taylor Act, which labor has condemned for its "unjust, harsh" penalties in forbidding public employe strikes.

In their appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, Shanker and the union challenged the constitutionality of the state law, particularly an interpretation by the New York State Supreme Court that the law properly allowed convictions without a jury trial.

In dismissing the appeal, 6-to-2, the majority held that there was not "a substantial federal question involved." The brief opinion noted that Justices Hugo L. Black and William O. Douglas felt there was a federal question involved and that the court should have granted review.

A CHECK for $2,000 to the General Electric strike relief fund was presented to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland by Pres. James Hare, center, of the Salaried Employes Association of Westinghouse Baltimore Divisions. Joseph H. Hiltz, chairman of the unaffiliated union's GE strike-relief committee, is at right. The union plans to make regular bi-monthly contributions.

Joint Bargaining Ruled Matter of Unions' Choice

The National Labor Relations Board's decision requiring General Electric Co. to participate in coordinated bargaining sought by unions does not give an employer the right to demand that unions bargain jointly, the board has ruled.

The decision came in a case involving an F. W. Woolworth Co. store in San Leandro, Calif., Retail Clerks Local 870, Hotel & Restaurant Employes Local 823 and the latter union's Alameda county executive board.

In December 1967, the board certified the Clerks to represent selling and non-selling employes and Local 823 to represent the store's culinary department employes.

The board declared that the store violated the National Labor Relations Act by "adamantly insisting on meeting the two unions simultaneously." It upheld an earlier order by an NLRB trial examiner that the store must bargain separately with the unions.

The decision found "no merit" in Woolworth's claim that it is merely seeking for itself what the agency required the employer to do in the GE decision of 1968.

The board emphasized that the GE decision was based on a section of the law giving employes "the basic right" to select their own bargaining representatives and members of their bargaining teams.

"The right of selection belongs to the employes," the board noted, "and it is only the employes or their duly designated bargaining representatives which may seek to exercise that right."

A company may propose that several unions meet simultaneously with it, the board said, but may not—as Woolworth has done—condition its willingness to bargain upon the joint presence of the unions.

Employer's Demand

A letter sent by the store's management to the Hotel & Restaurant Employes' local demanded joint negotiations on the basis that there is an interchange between employes on the sales floor and luncheonette that affects job classifications and rates of pay.

However, the board noted that this issue was raised at a representation hearing in the case and the board rejected it in denying the company a single storewide bargaining unit.

Under the law, the board concluded, an employer is not entitled to relitigate issues which were raised and decided in a representation proceeding.

The decision against the employer was made by a board panel composed of Members John H. Fanning, Sam Zagoria and Howard Jenkins, Jr.

'Twin Plants' At Border Tied To Lost Jobs

The AFL-CIO endorsed the goals of legislation establishing a Cabinet Committee on Opportunities for Spanish-Speaking People — and urged Congress to make it clear that the "twin plant" program along the Mexican border has the opposite effect.

Under this program, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said, U.S. firms have set up plants on the Mexican side of the border paying 30-cent-an-hour wages for assembly work with "minimal" finishing operations on the U.S. side.

Biemiller wrote Rep. John A. Blatnik (D-Minn.), chairman of a House Government Operations subcommittee that the AFL-CIO "supports efforts to assure that Spanish-speaking Americans share benefits of federal programs with all other Americans."

He urged that the committee report and the legislative record make clear that the proposed Cabinet committee will not "in any way subsidize the twin-plant program."

Biemiller stressed that Mexican-Americans in the Southwest, Los Angeles, Chicago and other major cities have been hurt by the "twin-plant runaway scheme" encouraged by some federal agencies.

Missouri AFL-CIO Leader to Retire

Jefferson City, Mo.—Pres. John I. Rollings of the Missouri AFL-CIO will retire from office Jan. 2. He will be succeeded by Vice Pres. Vincent J. Van Camp, who was elected acting president by the state labor council's executive board.

Rollings has been a member of the Barbers for 45 years and has served the state labor council since the merger of the AFL and CIO. He also had been the head of the St. Louis Central Trades Council and an officer of Barbers Local 102.

Van Camp, a member of Local 124 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, will fill the unexpired term of president until the 1970 state convention. He has been a vice president of the council seven years.

IUE Scores Company Charges:

'Don't Buy GE' Drive Mounts As Strike Passes 7th Week

"We will resume our meetings," he added, "just as soon as you are ready, even in part, to match the union's willingness to compromise and engage in genuine collective bargaining."

There were these other developments as the walkout moved through its seventh week:

- GE, in a new tactic, filed unfair practice charges against IUE with the National Labor Relations Board and launched a back-to-work drive.
- Shambo branded the charge that the union was refusing to bargain as "sheer fabrication, a publicity stunt." As for the back-to-work drive, he said it "is an ugly campaign doomed to failure."
- AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis told a Maritime Trades Dept. luncheon in Washington that voluntary and public social agencies in 33 states are giving "unprecedented support" to the needs of striking workers and their families.
- Former Sen. Paul Douglas (D-Ill.) accepted the chairmanship of a committee of prominent citizens being formed to support the GE strikers. (Story below.)

An IUE-CBC statement said GE's Dec. 6 proposal for a three-year pact was rejected because it contained "no improvement in previous unsatisfactory first-year wage proposals," a cost-of-living clause that wouldn't fully cover price increases, and "only pennies to meet the urgent need of a retirement program."

Further, the unions charged, "GE still insists on the right to cut wages during the contract" and "refuses the kind of arbitration procedures that would prevent arbitrary, one-sided job changes."

"To sum it up," the statement concluded, "GE has proposed to replace a completely inadequate one-year offer with a completely inadequate three-year offer."

Following that, IUE served a counter-proposal calling for a 16-month contract, to expire May 1, 1971, with an immediate wage boost of 35 cents an hour, and a full cost-of-living adjustment after the first year.

In announcing these proposed terms, IUE Pres. Paul Jennings said, "My associates and I are confident that if GE would accept this alternative the remaining contract issues could be resolved by intensive, good-faith bargaining in less than a week."

At the same time, he noted, the union still has two previous offers on the bargaining table—a 30-month contract scaled down from pre-strike proposals and a repeated offer to submit all issues to binding arbitration.

GE's back-to-work plans, aimed at breaking the strike, came to light when union negotiators obtained a "confidential" memorandum. It outlined five steps by which plant managers should try to lure strikers back to work, culminating with a Dec. 22 "final telephone call to all employes."

Noting that the plans were based on the pressures of the Christmas season, Shambo said, "Instead of playing Scrooge and spreading humbug, the company ought to look at the solidarity of the strike and seek to settle it with real negotiations."

One example of the strike's solidarity came from Louisville where IUE Local 761 reported that it actually has gained some 1,200 new members since the strike began.

In another development, five Democratic congressmen from Pennsylvania—Representatives William A. Barrett, Robert Nix, James A. Byrne, Joshua Eilberg and William J. Green—called upon GE management "to stay at the bargaining table" until the dispute is resolved.

In their wire to Baldwin, they said, "It would be particularly wise to recall that one always loses, not by failing to take, but by failing to give."

On the boycott front, reports poured into CBC's headquarters in New York of successful informational picketing in cities throughout the country and of a favorable response from Christmas shoppers.

There were some of the developments:

Hundreds of pickets, getting their assignments from the telephone book's "yellow pages," fanned out to distribute leaflets in front of GE's retail, wholesale and service outlets in the Memphis, Tenn., area.

The Wisconsin AFL-CIO announced it has formed local committees to hand out boycott literature in front of department stores "in all major cities throughout the state this month."

The Twin Cities' (Minneapolis and St. Paul) leading department store—Daytons—was an early boycott target of Minnesota labor. The State AFL-CIO is distributing boycott signs and leaflets to every city labor body.

"Stay alive—call five" became the keynote of a novel word-of-mouth boycott of GE in Fort Wayne, Ind. Each trade unionist is responsible for passing the boycott message to five friends and urging them to pass it along to five others.

The Los Angeles County AFL-CIO kicked off a whole series of continuing boycott demonstrations with an informational picketing display in the heart of the city's downtown shopping area.

Two major Long Island, N.Y., department stores removed all GE and Hotpoint appliances from sale. One of them told its supplier not to send any more and allowed boycott information to be placed inside the store.

In Washington, D. C., Giant Food stores and George's Radio & Television Co., a radio-television discount chain, gave assurances they would stop advertising GE products in their stores and in newspaper advertisements.

Similar reports of merchants' cooperation with the boycott came from cities across the nation. Pickets everywhere told of receiving a favorable reception from the public.

In answering GE's move to get the NLRB to declare that IUE has not bargained in good faith, Shambo accused the firm of a "ploy intended to distract public attention from the courts' scathing indictment of GE's unlawful behavior at the bargaining table."

He noted that coincidentally on the first day of the strike the 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals issued a decision finding GE violated the National Labor Relations Act by refusing to bargain with IUE in 1960.

The union reported that more recently the same court rejected GE's appeal for a rehearing in that case.

Labor Opens New Round Of GE Rallies

A new series of labor-sponsored rallies is underway across the country in support of the General Electric strike, the strikers' relief fund and the boycott of GE products.

The "double-B" rallies—standing for "a buck and a boycott"—are being sponsored by local central bodies with assistance from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization. Leaders of AFL-CIO unions will be featured speakers.

Initial meetings were held in Utica, N.Y., Rockford, Ill., Norfolk, Va., and Columbus, Ohio. Dates for rallies in other cities, with exact time and place still to be set, have been announced as follows:

Des Moines, Iowa, Dec. 15; Cincinnati, Dec. 15; Dec. 15; Jackson, Miss., Dec. 15; Danville, Ill., Dec. 16; Miami, Fla., Dec. 17; Wilmington, N.C., Dec. 17 and Tampa, Fla., Dec. 18.

Buffalo Unionist Named To Philharmonic Board

Buffalo, N.Y.—The president of the Buffalo AFL-CIO, George L. Wessel, has been named to the board of directors of the Buffalo Philharmonic Society. He is the first representative of labor named to the board.

Douglas Heads Citizens To Support GE Strikers

A national committee of prominent Americans is being organized to support the General Electric strikers, it was announced by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph.

Randolph said Paul Douglas, former senator from Illinois and long-time champion of economic justice, had accepted the chairmanship of the committee.

The group, to be known as the Citizens Committee to Support the GE Strikers, was jointly initiated by the League for Industrial Democracy and the A. Philip Randolph Institute. Bayard Rustin, executive director of the Institute, will serve as vice chairman of the committee.

In a letter to hundreds of well-known citizens throughout the country, Randolph said: "I believe that the issues is this strike transcend narrow labor-management conflict. They affect every American."

Describing the plight of the GE workers, he asserted that "the principle of economic justice in our society" is at stake in the strike.

"Over the years," Randolph recalled, "we have worked together on behalf of civil rights, the abolition of poverty and in other efforts to strengthen American democracy. I believe that now is the time for us to pull together once again—in support of the GE strikers."

The purpose of the Citizens Committee will be to educate the American people as to the issues in the strike and to mobilize public support for the GE workers and families in a variety of ways.

Among other things, the committee is planning to take newspaper advertisements to counter GE's propaganda blitz.

The coordinator of the committee's work will be Tom Kahn, executive director of the League for Industrial Democracy. The committee's address is 112 East 19th Street, New York, N.Y., 10003.

GE Boycott Grows

Jordan-Marsh Co. shoppers in Boston got the message of labor's boycott of struck GE products.

Members of the Retail Clerks and other unions in Chicago picketed in front of Marshall Field & Co.

Leaflets are distributed to Philadelphia shoppers, including a father with son.

Kris Kringles like this one made it clear GE products are on their Christmas "no-no" list.

Women were active in the informational picketing in cities throughout the nation.

In Baltimore and other cities leaflets and signs explain that labor isn't striking department stores, only the General Electric Co.

Boycott got under way in New York as banner was hoisted in front of AFL-CIO's union label information center.

Tax Justice In the Public Interest

EARLY IN 1969 when the tax reform struggle was first shaping up, the AFL-CIO told the House Ways & Means Committee that a "double standard of taxation heaps an unfairly great part of the burden of running the federal government on the shoulders of middle-income wage and salary earners."

These facts, the federation declared "are eroding public confidence in the tax structure and in the fairness of the federal government as well. . . . These inequities in the tax structure undermine public support for much-needed expansion of government services for a growing, urban population."

The AFL-CIO proposed a comprehensive, carefully documented program for closing major loopholes in the tax structure. They ranged from proposals to deal with capital gains, depletion allowances, tax exempt bonds, investment credits, farm-loss deductions, charitable contributions and many others. The total revenue that would be gained by the federal government if these inequities were corrected was estimated at $17 billion.

The AFL-CIO also proposed four simple tax relief proposals that would bring tax justice to the millions of taxpayers who pay their taxes regularly through the payroll withholding program. The relief proposals to aid more low and middle-income workers would have cost about $7 billion.

This would have given the government a net revenue gain of about $10 billion to be used for critically needed economic and social welfare programs.

THE AFL-CIO fought hard for this program and won a portion of it in the bill adopted by the House. The loopholes in the House bill were only partially and ineffectively closed, but a start was made.

In the Senate Finance Committee the struggle to win a greater measure of tax justice made no appreciable headway. When the measure hit the Senate floor the bill was further weakened by amendments that would drain off revenues badly needed for government programs.

The AFL-CIO has continued to press for tax justice, for closing the loopholes and providing equity for the poor and relief for the low and middle-income workers, as in the labor-supported Gore amendments. It is committed to its original program that real tax reform means restoring the full effect of taxation based on ability to pay and rising progressively as income increases.

American workers are paying more than their fair share of taxes because some taxpayers are paying less than their fair share.

If the tax loopholes were closed in the Senate bill in line with the AFL-CIO program and relief given to those in need of help there would be a revenue gain for the government of $8 billion, figuring in the increase in the personal exemption contained in the Gore amendment.

That's $8 billion that can be used to help solve the crisis in the cities, help clean up the environment, help educate America's children.

'Looks Like a White Christmas!'

A Word Edgewise:

Viet Cong Immorality Laid Basis for Song My Killings

By John P. Roche

IF YOU PULL your trigger, I'll pull mine—you're an American, not a ———butcher."

Almost 27 years ago on Tulagi in the Solomons a platoon leader rapped that order to one of his B.A.R. (Browning automatic rifle) men—a close friend of mine—who was set to shoot five Japanese advancing under a white flag. The Japanese had been mortared out of their bunker and apparently were trying to surrender.

At this point one may be wondering what kind of degenerate, corrupt nation could have produced a man who would shoot prisoners, helpless enemies suffering from concussion, desperately waving their handkerchiefs.

But it was not the B.A.R. man's background or lack of religious and civic training that was crucial; it was the fact that a week earlier another Japanese had emerged from the bush with a white flag and set a nasty ambush. As he approached the Marine position, two riflemen went out to grab him, the Japanese suddenly dropped to the ground and a machinegun cut down the two Americans.

While, in military terms, the two dead Marines had been incredibly stupid to break cover, their buddies nevertheless set out to even the score.

Similarly, in Europe, the discovery of the American soldiers who had been butchered by the Germans at Malmedy touched off the frontier syndrome; the next few weeks were extremely dangerous for captured members of the Wehrmacht, particularly those from S.S. formations. Anyone who starts out with the notion that Americans are saints has a lot to learn.

What happened at Song My has to be put in this context. It was not, as some would argue, final and convincing proof of American degeneration. It was an appalling example of failure of discipline.

Men in battle often go nuts, but it is the function of leadership to hold them to the highest possible standards of decent behavior. The platoon leader who threatened to shoot my friend made the point rather drastically, but he is the model.

However, the absolutely inexcusable crime of a handful of men should not be exploited to condemn a whole army. The fact is that in overall terms Americans in Viet Nam have behaved in a fashion that makes their fathers, who fought in World War II, look like Visigoths. What we have to understand is that a primary goal of the Viet Cong has been to convince the Americans that there are no innocent women and children, that the whole population is engaged in guerrilla warfare. Song My was thus a major VC victory; the Americans fell into the trap.

When I was in Saigon, for example, the VC was specializing in grenade attacks. The scenario was always the same; a teen-age boy on a Honda would chuck a grenade into restaurant and roar off into the traffic. One could hardly frisk every teenager on a motorcycle, so we lived in a slightly paranoidal condition, casting a fishy eye on Hondas.

"RADIO LIBERATION," the voice of the VC, added to this sense of unease. In one program they acclaimed the noble efforts of women guerrillas and proclaimed as heroine of the year an 18-year-old who had allegedly killed over 20 American "pirates." Needless to say, she was not in uniform. The constant theme of "Radio Liberation," reinforced by endless examples, is that every Vietnamese from the cradle onward is a belligerent against "imperialism."

Terrorism, as the Israelis are learning, is not easy to cope with. A small number of determined guerrillas can create fearful problems and the easy solution is mass retribution: destroy the village that sheltered the sniper, blow up the houses in the vicinity, lock up everyone in the area. Yet essential to any long-range settlement is the separation of the innocent from the guilty, and mass retribution drives them together.

Song My was the ultimate form of immoral desperation, of accepting the Viet Cong view that there are no innocents. It should be emphasized, however, that the killings are a blot on our national honor because we are not corrupt and degenerate, because we reject the standards of the enemy and will not tolerate Americans who accept them by becoming "———— butchers."

The Yardstick:

Right-Wing Attack on Rustin Refuted as Cheap Smear Tactic

By Msgr. George G. Higgins

The following is excerpted from Msgr. Higgins' column titled "In Defense of Bayard Rustin" in answer to an editorial to a right-wing Catholic publication, Twin Circle.

THE LEAD EDITORIAL on Bayard Rustin, the noted Negro civil rights leader, in the Nov. 23 issue of Twin Circle is, in my opinion, utterly beneath contempt.

The editorial was occasioned by a recent announcement that Notre Dame University has appointed Mr. Rustin to its board of trustees. The editor starts off by noting, with a snide, back-of-the-hand slap at Notre Dame, that this is the first time that a Negro has been invited to serve on the university's governing board.

He says that "the choice could hardly have been worse," and alleges that Rustin "worked directly for the Communist Party for a period of years and has remained a Communist sympathizer most of his life." He then goes on to add, for good measure, that "there seems to be no indication that he is not a Communist sympathizer now."

In my book, this is a cheap form of character assassination. It's almost, but not quite, as bad as the editor's indecent attempt to destroy Mr. Rustin's personal reputation by dredging up a morals charge to which Rustin is said to have pleaded guilty some 16 years ago. I have no way of knowing, and really no interest in knowing, whether or not there is anything in the record to substantiate this charge against Mr. Rustin

This I do know, however, that even if the editor of Twin Circle has irrefutable evidence to support it, he has debased himself and his paper by dredging it up, for polemical purposes, at this late date. If this is what we mean by freedom of the press, we had better start all over again and try to come up with a more compassionate and more Christian definition of the term.

Twin Circle's attempt to smear Mr. Rustin as a Communist sympathizer, while less obnoxious perhaps than its heartless effort to blacken Rustin's personal reputation, is a classic example of editorial irresponsibility. The editor takes note of the fact that Rustin has denied that he was ever a member of the Communist Party but then blithely goes on to say that "he could never deny that he has served the Communists well."

In support of this charge, he cites a 1964 article in the Saturday Evening Post which said that in "those first years Rustin gave most of his money to the (Communist) Party. . . ." That's not a statement of fact; it's merely an allegation. No court in the land would even dream of accepting it as evidence.

Again, however, even if the editor of Twin Circle could make the allegation stick in a court of law, he would still be left with the burden of proving that Rustin "has remained a Communist sympathizer most of his life." This he fails to do and, worse than that, ends up libeling several other individuals and organizations in the process.

He says, for example, that the late A. J. Muste, director of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, for whom Rustin worked at one time, "worked all his life for communism." That's a completely false and irresponsible statement—all the more so in view of the fact that Muste is no longer here to enter a rejoinder in his own name.

The editor also tries to create the impression that Martin Luther King's march on Washington, which Rustin helped to organize, was a Communist or pro-Communist demonstration. His only "proof" for this fantastic allegation is that "the Communists boasted in The Worker that (the march on Washington) was one of their projects." Since when did Twin Circle decide that The Worker is a reliable source of information on this or any other subject?

IN THE END, realizing that he hasn't been able to prove that Rustin "has remained a Communist sympathizer all his life," the editor suddenly goes off on a tangent and begins to play games with words. He says that while "Rustin tried to deny he had ever been a Communist, . . . he could never say he is not at least a Socialist." This is a desperate, last-ditch attempt on the editor's part to muddy the waters by leaving the impression with the unwary reader that communism and socialism are synonomous. He knows better than that.

He knows very well that communism and socialism are not interchangeable terms, and must also be aware of the fact that American Socialists have been among the most vigorous and most effective opponents of communism both at home and abroad. He also knows better than to suggest that Rustin is a dangerous "militant or anarchist or Red or just plain racist." If not—if he doesn't know that Rustin is among the most constructive, non-violent, anti-Communist, anti-racist, pro-integration leaders in the American civil rights movement—he has no business editing a newspaper.

As indicated above, the editor also takes a low-blow swipe at Notre Dame University. If and when Father Hesburgh, the distinguished president of the university, decides to respond to the editor's charge that Notre Dame has been playing footsie with the leftists in recent years, I am sure he will also come to the defense of Bayard Rustin.

Meanwhile, let me conclude by stating, for the record, that I am proud to be able to say that Bayard Rustin is a good friend of mine and that I hold him in very high esteem as an effective champion of social justice. One final word. I really couldn't care less whether Rustin is a Socialist or not. Some of my best friends are Socialists. Twin Circle, please copy.

54-Hour Week Decried:

Ranks of Fire Fighters Swell With Extension of Union Rights

FIRE FIGHTERS are turning to unions in growing numbers to bargain more effectively with their government employers, the president of the Fire Fighters, said in a network radio interview.

William H. McClennan said that since last August, the IAFF has formed 136 new local unions and added more than 7,000 new members, boosting its rolls to about 140,000 in the United States and Canada. He appeared on Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Professional fire fighters have seen other government workers form unions and move ahead, he said, and newly-enacted laws have given fire fighters the same right in many jurisdictions.

"They want to organize and get an education in labor, collective bargaining, and everything pertaining to labor," he said, so that they can more effectively use their right to "sit down at the bargaining table with city officials" to negotiate wages and working conditions.

McClennan said that in some areas, professional fire fighters now work as much as 70 hours a week for as little as $5,000 a year, with the average for the country as a whole, $7,000 to $9,000 for a 54-hour week. He said that the union's goal is a 40-hour week with an annual salary of $12,000.

McCLENNAN WARNED that long hours and low pay make it harder than ever to recruit new men for the hard and dangerous work of fire fighting, and that many cities now have a "serious manpower shortage" in their departments.

He said, "it is not uncommon" for big city department lists that once numbered several hundred to have shrunk to "fewer than 70" men awaiting appointment. Cities may "spend $60,000 or $70,000 for a piece of (fire) equipment, and then put only one man on it to operate it," he added.

Noting that the holiday season is "one of the busiest" of the year for fire fighters, McClennan urged special around-the-home precautions to guard against fire. He warned that overloaded electrical circuits and dried-out Christmas trees are especially dangerous, and that "new types of toys" and other objects around the home at this time of the year add to the risk of fire.

WHEN CONGRESS passed the 1968 Housing Act there was hope abroad in the land that the acute housing problem would be eased.

The bill reaffirmed our national housing goals and set forth a specific goal of building 26 million housing units over the next decade.

Included in this 26 million figure were 6 million units for lower income families.

Two of the most hopeful provisions of the 1968 Housing Act were directed to helping families with limited incomes to buy homes or rent apartments.

All of this is now crumbling in the devastating housing crisis. Housing starts have fallen off critically and Americans are now finding that not only is good housing difficult to achieve but we are paying more and more for poor housing.

"By 1972 housing is likely to be a major political issue," predicts Fortune Magazine.

Numerous explanations are offered for the housing crisis but most put tight money or high interest rates at the top.

Recently, the impact of tight money on the housing market received a thorough going over in the Senate during a debate on a measure to increase the supply of mortgage credit during this period of high interest.

Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) was author of the bill. He pointed out that housing has "traditionally been a balance wheel in our economy, bearing the main burden in the fight against inflation."

Studies have shown, Proxmire said, that the housing industry comprises about 3 percent of our gross national product—total of all goods and services. Yet, housing takes between 60 percent and 70 percent of the cutback in the fight against inflation.

"The impact is clearly discriminatory and unfair," the senator declared.

"When we look at our annual rate of expenditure in the third quarter compared to the last quarter of 1968," Proxmire said, "we find that housing is the only sector which has been forced to cut back."

The overall GNP is up 5.6 percent, consumer spending on durable goods is up 4.6 percent, new plants and equipment is up 9.8 percent and even state and local spending is up but residential construction is down 2.5 percent.

"One would think," Proxmire said, "that housing would be forging ahead. We have the greatest demand; the worst housing shortage in years. New family formations are at an all-time high."

A FEW STATISTICS show what is happening to the housing industry. Last January, housing starts were at an annual rate of 1,878,000. It skidded to 1,383,000 in August but rose in September to 1,518,000. Proxmire predicts that for the entire year housing starts will average 1.3 million. Others in the industry have expressed fear that it could drop to 1 million.

If we ever hope to achieve the 10-year housing goal we must build 1.8 to 2 million units a year.

Proxmire provided some facts why tight money is making our housing goal impossible.

He noted that 20 years ago a veteran could purchase a home for $10,000 and at 4 percent interest and his monthly payments for principle and interest would be under $50.

Today, a similar home would cost the veteran at least $20,000. He would be lucky if he could get an 8 percent mortgage. At this rate, his monthly payments would be nearly $150.

"The price of the home has doubled," Proxmire said. "The rate of interest has doubled but the monthly payments have tripled."

Proxmire told the Senate that he cannot quarrel with the efforts of the Nixon Administration to control inflation. However, he said, "certain high officials in the Administration seem to have a callous indifference to the fact that the average homeowner is called upon to pay most of the cost."

INCREASING NUMBERS of fire fighters are turning to unions to bargain more effectively with their government employers, Fire Fighters Pres. William H. McClennan, center, said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Stanley Levey, left, of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine. The program is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on Mutual radio.

How To Buy:

National Hunger Conference Ignores Food Prices, Labeling

By Sidney Margolius

WORKING FAMILIES didn't get much help and consideration in their struggle with present high food prices from the White House Conference on Food, Nutrition and Health.

The much-publicized conference early in December was noticeably dominated by food corporation executives. Many were from companies that had bitterly fought "truth in packaging" and other consumer protection, such as General Foods, McCormick Co., Campbell Soup and the meat packers.

Just as shocking were the attitudes of some of the Agriculture Dept. representatives at the conference. They sided with the businessmen in fighting off proposals aimed at reducing prices.

The president of Campbell was the chairman of one of the most important panels affecting your pocketbook, that on staple foods. McCormick was represented on several panels. McCormick is the company that invited the House Commerce Committee to see how "difficult" it would be to make standard-sized packages. That "demonstration" helped kill the standardized-weights provision of the original packaging bill.

General Foods is the company whose then chairman wrote that "Let's Keep Politics Out of the Pantry" article in Look when the packaging bill was under consideration.

Some of the recommendations that came out of the conference were still useful. Many of those dealing with the food problems of he poor stressed the immediate need to expand food stamp and other emergency programs. The fact is that some 25 million Americans have incomes so low that they may have difficulty getting enough to eat in this winter of high food prices.

But many of the recommendations were simply for more education in nutrition.

This is dodging the real problems, of course. While nutritional education is desirable, no amount of "education" really can take the place of more reasonable prices. Low-income people already are better buyers than middle-income and richer people. They buy more calories and more protein and other nutrients for the dollar than other income groups, the Agriculture Dept. reports.

Where nutritional and shopping information is really most needed and useful is at the point of sale, which means right on the package label.

The most urgent need is to require that labels state the percentages of each ingredient in the product. Low-income families tend especially often to buy products that seem cheap, like frankfurters and lunch meats, unaware that these usually have 30 percent fat, 10 percent water and thus only 60 percent of the higher-quality nutrients.

IT IS NOTICEABLE that the nutritional quality of American diets has been going down in a period of relative affluence, even as the marketing and use of such low-nutrition food products have increased dramatically.

One of the industry-dominated panels at the conference said that the main purpose of food labels is to "provide information that will promote its use." But what consumers want are labels that give them more information on what's really in the box.

It was also remarkable that at a conference concerned with food and nutrition problems held in a time of severe inflation, practically nothing was said about the high prices of food. Giving food stamps to the poor is all right with industry. That means the manufacturers and stores sell more products. But it also means that the public is subsidizing and even perpetuating high food prices.

The plain fact is that food prices are too high. Certainly they are too high in comparison to the traditional spread from price "spread" from farm to market. Farmers used to get 50 cents of the retail food dollar, and distribution took 50 cents. In recent years farmers have gotten only 37-40 cents, while distribution has taken 60-63 cents. Reducing the marketing margin to the former 50-50 ratio alone could reduce present food prices as much as 20 percent.

Soup to Nonsense:

Tongue-Biting Mothers-in-Law Elevate the Image of Their Lot

By Jane Goodsell

EVER SINCE THE DAY I became a mother-in-law, I've been keeping my eyes and my ears open and asking questions. My motive was not pure scientific inquiry. I really wanted to know. How were other women adapting to the unflattering new role in which I found myself?

What I discovered, to put it in a nutshell, is this: Mothers-in-law act just like everybody else—only better. More tactful. More patient. More tolerant. More considerate of others. They never raise their voices, they never give advice, and they'd bite off their tongues before they'd offer a word of criticism.

Such exemplary behavior does not come easy. Easy? It requires the self-discipline you'd normally expect from a Trappist monk to watch your son-in-law administer a spanking to the sweetest, most adorable grandchild in the whole world—and not utter a word of protest. Yet a friend of mine, whom I'd previously considered an impulsive sort, did just that. She had to leave the room and stick her fingers in her ears so she wouldn't hear poor little Bobby's piteous wails, but she kept her vow never to interfere.

Another lady told me with justifiable pride that she had observed her daughter-in-law washing a head of lettuce in hot soapy water—and she didn't say a word. She merely clenched her fists and averted her eyes.

Still another friend dropped in at her newly married daughter's apartment one Sunday afternoon to deliver some late-arrival wedding gifts. She found her daughter on a stepladder, painting the kitchen, and her son-in-law in the living room, drinking beer and watching a football game on TV. My friend not only didn't raise her eyebrows, she managed to restrain herself from sticking around to steady the ladder.

IN SHORT, mothers-in-law are zealously striving to live down their bad name and improve their corporate image. And they're succeeding. The fact that mother-in-law jokes are now outdated is proof of that.

As for me, I'm a novice at this business of being adorable, relaxed and sweet-tempered, and I may be over-reacting to the point of seeming slightly off my rocker. One day, when my new son-in-law tracked mud into my freshly vacuumed hall, I laughed merrily and trilled, "Oh, think nothing of it! What difference does a little dirt make?"

And when my daughter admired the needlepoint pillow I'd made to cover the worn spot in the sofa, I gave it to her insisting that I had no use for it myself.

Later, my husband asked me with some concern if I was taking tranquilizers or something. He said I wasn't acting like myself. He's right. I'm not acting like myself. I'm acting like a mother-in-law. And everyone ought to thank their lucky stars for that.

Wages Put at 16% Of New Home Costs

Milwaukee—Construction labor costs on a $21,200 three-bedroom house in this area run about $3,444—or 16 percent of the total, a study by the Milwaukee Building & Construction Trades Council revealed.

The study was conducted in cooperation with a Milwaukee building contractor in an effort to establish the facts on construction costs and refute charges that labor costs are responsible for the high price of housing, the council said.

Pres. John Zancanaro of the trades council said "the rising cost of materials, the soaring cost of land and particularly exorbitant interest rates have become the principal factors in the inflated prices of real estate today."

The $21,200 cost of the test home included the $5,000 price tag of a typical lot for such a house in the Milwaukee area.

Zancanaro said the number of manhours needed to complete the home by skilled union craftsmen totaled 506½ hours.

The findings shattered the widespread myth that labor is the major factor in the cost of home construction, Zancanaro observed. He said there appears to be a general misconception that labor costs account for more than 50 percent of the price of a new home.

Here is a breakdown of the construction labor costs:

Type of Work	Manhours	Cost
Excavating	4 hours	$ 25.00
Footings, base floor	17	101.69
Basement	36	239.52
Carpentry	217	1,422.40
Gutters and heating	20	138.20
Roofing	7	44.24
Electrical	32	213.12
Plumbing	42	301.14
Outside sewer	5½	32.72
Painting	72	454.07
Tile	6	37.80
Driveway, landscaping	48	277.20
(Social Security)	—	257.77
Total	506½	$3,444.37

Challenge to Labor

Where is the labor movement today and what are its many areas of activity? What is its future?

President Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers has set forth answers to these questions in his book, "Challenge to Labor."

Starting with the organization of the printers, the shoemakers or cordwainers in the 18th Century, Beirne provides a meaningful interpretation of labor history up to 1969. It is interpreted from the perspective of today so that young unionists or students, who did not experience the upsurge of unionism in the 1930s, realize that this period is important for the lessons it has for us today.

Far too few unionists understand labor's current role in politics, in community activities, in international affairs, in its relationship to government and legislation. Beirne has been an active leader in all these areas and explains why he feels that the labor movement must have essential involvement.

In this affluent society he believes that we cannot move ahead until "everyone has a living wage, a decent wage, a decent home, unlimited educational opportunity, economic opportunity and equality of citizenship."

IN HIS FOREWORD to the book, former Sec. of Labor Willard Wirtz wrote:

"Whatever shortcomings any may sense or detect, none can honestly underrate the impressive contribution made by trade unions to the well being of the nation. Mr. Beirne correctly recognizes the fact that labor has played an essential role in preserving and fortifying the American 'pluralism' which is so fundamental to the democratic process."

Conference Sounds Hunger Emergency

Pres. Nixon has been urged by a White House Conference on Food, Nutrition & Health to declare a national hunger emergency so as to "free funds and implement programs to feed all hungry Americans this winter."

The call for declaration of an emergency was part of a statement agreed to by leaders of the conference's eight task forces and adopted by a plenary session of the 2,500 participants.

The task forces represented consumers, women's groups, religious groups, agriculture, health professionals, students, community organizations and labor. Participants from the AFL-CIO endorsed the statement in principle without taking a position on certain specifics.

Although there was sharp controversy during the three-day conference over what should be done to end hunger in the United States, the statement was the only one adopted by the full meeting.

Conference participants came from nearly all areas of American life. About 50 from labor included representatives of AFL-CIO unions and federation departments with concern in the area.

Pres. Nixon, who opened the conference, promised to give its recommendations full consideration. He repeated the promise later in a televised press conference.

The task forces' statement called for a federally-guaranteed minimum income of $5,500 a year for a family of four in contrast to the Administration's proposed welfare floor of $1,600 for such a family.

The government must also guarantee "a meaningful job with a living wage to those who can work" and the "elevation of wages and benefits to those presently underemployed," the statement declared.

It proposed "extension to all working people of the right to bargain collectively for wages, hours, and working conditions, including the right to strike or boycott when necessary."

The statement recommended extension of unemployment insurance to workers not presently covered, a 50 percent increase in social security benefits and reform of food industry pricing, packaging and promotion policies.

In other areas, it asked for a cut in food stamp costs by a presidential executive order and establishment of a universal free school lunch program.

As interim measures, it said, "present food programs must be reformed and expanded immediately in order to assure truly adequate benefits and participation by all who need them in all parts of the country."

PEOPLE'S ART EXHIBITION is displayed at the Countee Cullen Library gallery in Harlem by the Performing Arts & Cultural Project of the New York City AFL-CIO. Nearly 100 pieces of art produced by union members will be shown through Jan. 2.

Rollcall Vote in Senate On $800 Tax Exemption

Labor supported the Senate's action in increasing the personal exemption on income tax from the present $600 to $800, along with other changes to help taxpayers in the low- and middle-income brackets.

On the AFL-CIO's scoreboard, the 58 senators who voted for the $800 exemption cast "Right" votes; the 37 who opposed it voted "Wrong."

Arts Projects Exhibit Opens In New York

New York—Paintings, sculptures, ceramics, tapestries and other works of art created by union members in the New York City area are being shown in a month-long exhibition at a Harlem branch of the New York Public Library.

Nearly 100 art pieces are displayed in the "People's Art" exhibit sponsored by the Performing Arts & Cultural Project of the New York City Central Labor Council.

This is the first in the series of exhibits planned in various parts of the city which also will include programs in drama, music and dancing.

Classes are being considered by the city's Performing Arts & Cultural Project to help stimulate the creative forces among trade union members.

The Harlem exhibit drew praise from community leaders and professionals in the arts field who cited the after-work artistic efforts of the trade unionists.

Entries for the show were selected and arranged by Harry Avrutin, arts subcommittee coordinator of the project, and Manuel Barfield, art exhibit chairman and secretary-treasurer of Retail Clerks Local 888.

Chicago Daily Admits Error In Rejecting Ad

Chicago—The Chicago Tribune, which previously set up a series of road blocks to accepting union advertisements on the General Electric strike, has changed its mind.

Charles B. Jordan, Tribune general advertising manager, told the advertising agency for the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee that a newspaper ad man had erred in rejecting an ad on Nov. 6 because it was not labeled "political".

At the time, CBC protested on the grounds the newspaper accepted GE management ads without a "political" label. The unions also charged that a series of other conditions set up for the union's ad showed the Tribune was applying a double standard.

The unions, through their agency, told Jordan they were "appreciative" of his correcting the situation. However, they declined his invitation to resubmit the earlier ad since it had already appeared in other Chicago newspapers.

Outreach Training Plan Hits Peak for 9 Months

The Apprenticeship Outreach program indentured a record 2,717 minority youths as apprentices in the building trades during the first nine months of 1969, Labor Sec. George Shultz reported.

This brings a total of 5,042 young men who have been prepared for the craft apprenticeship programs by community action organizations and AFL-CIO building trades councils across the country since the Outreach operation was launched 28 months ago.

Outreach programs are operated in 55 major industrial areas by 10 different sponsoring groups.

The tutor and cram technique is used to prepare the youths—Negro, Puerto Rican, Mexican-American and Indian—for specific examinations in the construction trades.

Further Expansion

Outreach operations are expected to be expanded to 10 more larger cities within the next three months through the cooperation of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights and representatives of the Workers Defense League and the National Urban League.

More than $4 million in federal funds have been used in the Outreach contracted operations.

The Labor Dept. has recently awarded several more Outreach contracts totaling more than $1.3 million to prepare about 1,085 youths for the craft apprenticeships.

The contracts will go to area Building & Construction Trades Councils and units of the Workers Defense League.

An 18-month contract for $941,980 to the WDL will be for 725 youths in several major metropolitan areas in the East. The courses will be given to 125 youths in Brooklyn, N.Y., 100 in Harlem, 30 each in Nassau and Suffolk counties in New York, 75 in Buffalo, 50 in Rochester, 100 each in Cleveland and Newark, N.J., 50 in Nashville and 35 in Lexington, Ky.

The San Francisco BCTD Council received a $119,211 grant to prepare another 100 minority youths for the trades apprenticeships. In a previous Outreach project, the San Francisco council exceeded its goal of placing more than 100 apprentices.

Five AFL-CIO building trades councils in California's Sacramento Valley were awarded a one-year contract for $102,703 to prepare 70 young men for apprenticeships.

The Dallas Building & Construction Trades Council received a renewal Outreach contract for $69,500 for the training of another 60 minority youths. With an earlier contract, the council prepared and placed 178 youths in the trades, more than quadrupling its original goal of 40.

Two other Outreach contracts totaling more than $97,000 will go to the Houston Gulf Coast Building Trades Council and the New Mexico Building & Construction Trades Council to prepare 105 youths.

The Houston project will operate in 20 area counties with $49,745 in federal funds. New Mexico's Outreach project will be offered in 32 counties under a $47,725 federal grant.

In another one-year contract with the Tri-County Urban League at Peoria, Ill., 25 youths will receive the preparation training. That contract is for $54,367.

Steelworkers Hit by Imports Eligible for Aid

Some 600 members of the Steelworkers who lost their jobs in three steel plants in California and Pennsylvania have been certified eligible to apply for adjustment benefits under the Trade Expansion Act of 1962, the Labor Dept. said.

Labor Dept. certification follows an earlier finding by the Tariff Commission that the workers became unemployed because of increased imports affecting steel transmission towers and welded pipe.

The certification, like the commission's ruling, was the first of its kind. In the past, the commission rejected all requests for relief under what the AFL-CIO had charged was an overly rigid interpretation of the law.

The workers certified are about 260 who lost their jobs at U.S. Steel's American Bridge Division plants in Pittsburgh and Los Angeles, and 350 who were dismissed by Armco Steel Corp. at Ambridge, Pa.

The workers, laid off at varying periods, are eligible for adjustment aid, retroactive to their layoff, of approximately $80 a week for up to 52 weeks. There are also additional benefits for workers over 60 and retraining programs, as well as relocation allowances.

KEYNOTING the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center's opening session Dec. 7, Andrew Biemiller, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation (center), gave the history of the development of various state legislatures. The initial five-day institute on Critical Problems in State Government, attended by AFL-CIO state central body officers and staff, was under the direction of the center's executive director, Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., seated with Biemiller.

new responsibilities and power, Biemiller noted, since the federal government has begun referring more and more problems to states through grant-in-aid programs.

Rep. William D. Ford (D-Mich.) discussed "Issues in State Constitutional Reform," stressing particularly the need for judges to be responsible to the electorate.

The object of the course was twofold: to provide technical training for responsible state AFL-CIO staff, plus more in-depth understanding of problems.

This was done by providing them with more information on their state governments and by enlarging their expertise on labor's position regarding essential issues. Students were given the opportunity to raise questions with experts in fields relevant to their own states.

Program coordinator for the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center is Lawrence Rogin. Speakers included Larry Margolis, director of the Citizens Conference on State Legislature; Dr. Royce Hanson, director of the Washington Center for Metropolitan Studies; Arnold Cantor, AFL-CIO economist, Frank Fernbach, assistant to the president of the Steelworkers; Elizabeth Wickenden, professor of Urban Studies, City University of New York, and Clinton Fair, AFL-CIO legislative representative.

African Unions Display Skills At Congo Fair

Kinshasa, The Congo—African labor unions, with the help of the African-American Labor Center, showed what they are contributing to Africa's development at the Kinshasa International Fair, which drew more than 600,000 visitors.

The focal point of a U.S. Dept. of Labor exhibit, with the theme African Self Help, was a demonstration of tailoring skills learned by students at the AALC-sponsored Tailoring & Cutting Institute in Nairobi.

The institute has trained more than 300 Kenyan tailors to date and in so doing has established a new industry in Kenya.

An article in International Labor, a bi-monthly magazine of the Labor Dept., also described the exhibit's display of training aids and programs used by other AALC-backed cooperatives in bringing new skills to workers throughout Africa.

Plan to Muzzle Labor Crushed by 59-27 Vote

amendment could "stifle" the freedom of a number of "worthy" organizations. His substitute proposal was beaten, 63-25.

Two days later, at the tail end of a late night session, Sen. Bob Dole (R-Kan.) introduced an even more sweeping amendment, directed solely at unions and not applicable to any other organizations.

Tax-exempt status would be allowed only if unions "do not participate in, or intervent in—including the publication or distribution of statements—any political campaign on behalf of any candidate."

Even some of the most conservative senators gagged at this proposal and the Dole amendment was defeated, 71-10.

Despite the one-sided defeat, Fannin and the National Right to Work Committee indicated they would continue their efforts to drive unions out of the political arena.

Mondale told the Senate that the Right to Work Committee, which has the same type of tax-exempt status as unions and business organizations such as the National Association of Manufacturers, "completely distorted" the facts in its newspaper advertisements.

He pointed out that federal law already bars financial contributions to candidates or parties from union and corporate treasuries. But, he stressed, the voluntary contributions to COPE, which are not tax deductible, are "perfectly lawful" and the same voluntary contribution technique is used by business organizations as well.

"Fundamental fairness," Mondale stressed, "supports the opportunity of millions of working men and women to counter the effectiveness of the small group of wealthy citizens who can afford highly visible and memorable large contributions."

By going beyond existing legal restrictions on use of union funds, Mondale charged, the amendment's "total intent is to drive from the field of political action all those whose strength is provided by joining into associations for the pursuit of a common goal other than business profits."

Although the legal effect of loss of tax exempt status is "not clear," Mondale said, it could result in a "devastating" tax levy on union strike funds and other reserves.

Fannin, whose voting record in the 90th Congress showed him on the wrong side of every key vote on COPE's scorecard, told the Senate that "it is simply not true" that he introduced his proposal out of "antilabor bias."

He thinks very highly of America's workers, Fannin insisted, and his only quarrel is with some "greedy" union leaders "who are bent on removing incentive" and who "no longer regard a good day's work for a good day's pay as a proper goal."

$300 Minimum Won At Washington Post

The Washington-Baltimore Newspaper Guild and the Washington Post have agreed on a new 22-month contract that will raise most salaries 13 percent immediately and another 7 percent a year from now.

The new contract will assure a minimum of $300 a week after four years experience for reporters, photographers, editors, editorial writers, artists and other technicians. The present minimum is $233 a week.

Labor Costs Held Equal for Men, Women

Cost differences in employing men and women are not significant, according to a newly revised publication issued by the Labor Dept.

The report, prepared by the Women's Bureau, summarizes the latest available data on certain factors that affect labor costs—absenteeism, labor turnover, job tenure and labor mobility.

The data include, for example, Public Health Service statistics on worktime lost because of illness or injury, which averaged 5.6 days for women and 5.3 days for men in 1967. On the other hand, earlier PHS data showed fewer sick days per year for single women (3.9 days) than for single men (4.3 days).

The report states that women workers have favorable records of attendance and labor turnover when compared with men employed at similar job levels and under similar circumstances.

Detailed analyses indicate that the skill level of the job, the marital status and age of the worker, length of service, and record of job stability provide better clues to differences in work performance than does the mere fact that the worker is a man or a woman.

Studies on labor turnover show that overall job-changing rates are about the same for women and men. In 1968, 2.6 percent of women workers and 2.2 percent of men workers quit their jobs voluntarily, according to a Bureau of Labor Statistics study.

Senate Record:

Key Rollcall Votes On Curbing Unions

The Senate on Dec. 8 defeated two amendments to the tax bill which sought to restrict or prohibit union political action and political education programs.

VOTE NO. 1 was on a "compromise" proposal by Sen. Herman E. Talmadge (D-Ga.). It was the less punitive of the two, but it nevertheless would have curtailed the ability of the trade union movement to support labor's friends and oppose its enemies. The Talmadge amendment was rejected, 63-25. Democrats cast 43 Right votes (R) against it, six Wrong votes (W) for its passage. Twenty Republicans cast Right votes and 19 voted Wrong.

VOTE NO. 2 was on the harsh amendment by Sen. Paul J. Fannin (R-Ariz.) which would have punished unions and other organizations for engaging in almost any type of political activity, including voter registration, by removing their tax-exempt status. The Fannin amendment was beaten, 59-27. On this vote, 42 Democrats were Right and nine voted Wrong. Seventeen Republicans voted Right and 18 were Wrong.

The AFL-CIO urged the defeat of both amendments and supported the position of senators marked "R" in both columns. A few senators, including Fannin, voted against the Talmadge amendment only because they didn't think it was sufficiently anti-union. Their voting records would therefore show an R in the first column and a W for the second vote.

Other symbols: PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; A—absent and not paired. An asterisk after the A* indicates that the senator was announced Right (as against the amendment) at the time of the rollcall.

Machinists Win 'Equal Time' Talk

Decatur, Ga.—The Machinists won representation rights for workers at the Woodman Co. here in a National Labor Relations Board election that was preceded by a debate between a spokesman for labor and the company.

When Roy Bond and Tom Walters, IAM representatives, heard that the employer was going to meet with employes before the voting, they challenged management to let the union also speak at the meeting. To their surprise, the company accepted.

On short notice, AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Oliver Singleton appeared before the employes for the union and debated the value of having a union with a Woodman attorney.

The vote in the election was 76 for the Machinists and 41 for no union.

To Protect Workers' Rights:

Safeguards Urged On Pension Funds

Federal legislation is needed to protect the pension rights of workers and improve safeguards for health and welfare funds, the AFL-CIO testified.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, joined by Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman, expressed labor's support for the goals of two bills introduced by Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.). Dent is chairman of the House Labor subcommittee dealing with the legislation.

One of the bills would set up a government insurance program for pension funds and establish standards for funding and vesting; the other would amend the Welfare & Pension Plan Disclosure Act to spell out the obligations of trustees to guard against misuse of funds.

Both bills are needed, Biemiller said. But he urged amendments to strengthen portions of the legislation and in other sections eliminate several unnecessary and burdensome restrictions.

On the pension fund bill, the AFL-CIO strongly endorsed creation of a Pension Benefit Insurance Corp., which would be financed by an annual premium of two-tenths of 1 percent of the amount insured.

The insurance would be compulsory and would guarantee that workers receive the benefits due them. The AFL-CIO urged that the insurance be required to cover all unfunded liabilities of a pension plan, not just the vested liabilities.

Three Directors

Under the bill, three directors of the corporation would be appointed by the President. The AFL-CIO proposed that one of the directors be a representative of labor and another be chosen to represent management.

On pension funding and vesting requirements, the federation strongly urged that a sharp distinction be made between pension funds covering a single employer and multi-employer funds in which a worker carries his pension credits with him when he changes jobs within the industry. For this reason, Biemiller said, there is no need to require vesting in multi-employer funds.

Single-employer funds, because of the danger of an employer going out of business, should meet the highest actuarial standards of funding with a requirement for vesting after 10 years of service, the federation said.

But the AFL-CIO stressed that the present Internal Revenue Service regulations, which all pension plans must meet on funding, is fully adequate for multi-employer plans which are not endangered if one of the employers goes out of business.

Biemiller also urged other changes in the proposed legislation. He said the Secretary of Labor should have the power to investigate a fund only when he has "reasonable cause" to believe the law is being violated and not as an unsubstantiated "fishing expedition." And he urged, as an additional safeguard for workers, that the federal bankruptcy law be amended "to provide that a health, welfare or pension plan should have a priority claim against the assets of the employer, immediately following wages."

On the separate welfare and pension plan legislation, the AFL-CIO urged that new federal legislation specifically pre-empt state laws in the same field.

A number of such plans cover workers in more than one state and some union welfare plans are national in scope, he noted.

Equal Standards

The same standards applicable to trustees of union-management welfare and pension plans should be required of "third parties" that administer programs, the AFL-CIO said, including insurance companies and banks.

The federation endorsed the "prudent man" doctrine spelled out in the proposed legislation. It would require persons with control over funds to carry out their responsibilities "with the same degree of care and skill as a man of ordinary prudence would exercise in dealing with his own property."

The testimony spelled out a number of sections where the AFL-CIO believes amendments are necessary, including provisions dealing with the investigative authority of the Secretary of Labor. And the bills' bar of persons convicted of crimes from serving as trustees should be clarified to apply to crimes involving "a fiduciary relationship," the federation suggested.

While urging specific changes in the bill, Biemiller stressed the AFL-CIO's strong support for the fullest protection of health, welfare and pension funds.

"Welfare and pension benefits are a part of the collective bargaining package," Biemiller observed. The funds set aside for them, he emphasized, "are in fact part of the employes' remuneration, accepted in lieu of wages. The funds set aside for these plans belong to the workers covered by them" and must be safeguarded to assure that the workers and their families "receive the benefits to which they are entitled."

AN EFFIGY of the Bolivian Indians' "god of prosperity" was presented to the American Institute for Free Labor Development by Eduardo Figueroa of Bolivia, at the microphone, a graduate of AIFLD's 29th training program at Front Royal, Va. Presentation was made to William C. Doherty, Jr., AIFLD executive director, right, during graduation exercises in Washington.

AIFLD Class Studies Labor Communications

Graduates of the 29th training program of the American Institute for Free Labor Development were told that they have an especially important role to play in helping develop their nations.

This is so, speakers noted, because the class was made up of Latin American trade unionists who came to AIFLD's school in Front Royal, Va., to hone their skills in "labor communications."

The speakers were Assistant Sec. of State Charles A. Meyer and Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers, who addressed graduation exercises, and Pres. William G. Harley of the National Association of Educational Broadcasters, who spoke at a luncheon.

The 17 graduates came from Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, Nanama, Peru and Uruguay.

The class—the first of its kind at the school—studied techniques of U.S. newspapers, radio and television and took field trips to watch communications media in operation. The students also learned about the role of the labor press in the United States.

Meyer, who is U.S. coordinator for the Alliance for Progress, told the students that free and democratic unions have values which "make them true instruments of development."

Fuller Understanding

"Over the years," he added, "their efforts in behalf of human dignity and freedom provide a common expression of rights that men everywhere can understand and accept."

In addition to using their "new skills to help close the gap between hope and attainment" in their countries, Meyer urged the graduates to "create an awareness of the trade union movement and its impact on development."

"It is information," he suggested, "that merits better dissemination not only to those who might join your ranks but to those who are the architects of development in the hemisphere."

True economic development that benefits all of the people "is dependent upon men, their skills, motivations and institutions such as your unions," Meyer said.

Beirne deplored the fact that there are too many nations, including some in Latin America, "where men do not have the right to communicate freely with their brothers and sisters."

"As communicators," he said, "you have an important contribution to make if the family of man is to become a better family."

Emphasizing that there is no institution more dedicated to advancing freedom than the labor movement, Beirne called upon the graduates to use their skills as they see fit, "but use them to improve the living standards of workers."

The CWA president also described the current strike and boycott against General Electric Co., declaring that the struggle boils down to "a giant corporation's challenge of the right of unions to represent workers."

Harley expressed the hope that the students will return to their countries to become increasingly involved in expanding education through radio and television.

Expanded Educational TV

He explained the development of educational television and radio in the United States to the point where there now are about 184 educational TV stations and 400 educational radio stations.

Describing education of illiterate peoples as "the number-one priority" in every developing nation, he said television has "most exciting potentialities for making a major contribution to this task."

Lorenzo Parker Dupuy of Panama, speaking at the graduation as class representative, praised the institute for "wisely recognizing the importance of labor-communications."

The class, he said, must commit itself to achieving stronger trade unions "and what the free world longs for: peace, progress and social justice."

Cement Union Given Grant To Train 1,250

A new 16-month program is being funded by the Labor Dept. for upgrading the skills of 350 journeymen Plasterers & Cement Masons and training 900 prospective apprentices.

The program will be financed by a $1,088,690 grant under the Manpower Development & Training Act, Labor Sec. George P. Shultz announced.

Eighty-three projects will be operated in 44 states under the program, which is coordinated by the Plasterers & Cement Masons and the Portland Cement Association.

This is a follow-up contract to one signed in August 1967 that provided for 1,500 trainees under a $1.4 million grant and operated in 34 states. With half of the 1967 program completed, the new contract will extend the original effort without a break in continuity, the Labor Dept. said.

$831 per Trainee

The federal investment per trainee in the new program will run about $831.

Shultz noted that the union and the industrial association have been working together to bring improvements in the industry through training programs among joint apprenticeship committees, district councils and union locals.

The prospective apprentices will be recruited from among the minority groups, disadvantaged persons and the underemployed and underskilled. Trainees will be paid by the employers when they begin their apprenticeships.

About 900 jobless workers will get special training for six weeks in applied English, arithmetic and other basic skills that are related to job needs. This will be followed by 20 weeks of on-the-job training.

The training plan calls for 705 cement mason apprentices and 195 plasterer apprentices.

The upgrading for journeymen will include 42 hours of instruction during working hours on new techniques and materials in the industry. An additional 50 journeymen will be trained as instructors.

Glass Union Wins Vote At Johns-Manville Plant

Winder, Ga.—The Glass & Ceramic Workers won a key election at the Johns-Manville Corp. plant here, 41-14, in a vote conducted by the National Labor Relations Board.

Glass Worker Vice Pres. Everett Kanatzar, director of organizing for his union, conducted the campaign with the cooperation of AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Oliver Singleton, other staff members, and an employe organizing committee.

Building Trades Panel Resumes Disputes Plan

The National Joint Board of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and the National Participating Contractors Employers' Associations announced it will resume processing jurisdictional disputes.

In a joint statement by the labor and employer organizations, it was noted that negotiations will begin soon on improvements in the procedural rules under which the board operates. Deadline for the talks was set for Feb. 28 under an interim agreement.

William J. Cour will continue as chairman of the National Joint Board and Richard J. Mitchell as chairman of the appeals board.

Labor representatives on the joint board are Frank X. Hanley of the Operating Engineers, Maurice Fancher of the Laborers, James J. O'Toole of the Sheet Metal Workers and Robert A. Georgine of the Lathers.

The appeals board representatives from labor are William Sidell of the Carpenters, John L. McCarthy of the Iron Workers, Andrew B. Haas of the Asbestos Workers and William T. Dodd of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters.

NLRB Warns Oil Firm On 'Brainwash' Episode

Pasadena, Tex.—The next time Shell Oil management wants to compel its employes to attend a meeting aimed at influencing legislation before Congress, it will have to first negotiate with the union, a National Labor Relations Board regional director declared.

Local 4-367 of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers protested to the NLRB after the company ordered all workers to attend a lecture on company time urging support for the oil depletion allowance tax loophole.

The NLRB's acting regional director, Arthur Safos, informed the union that its objection was valid and the compulsory attendance order "was a mandatory subject of bargaining."

Safos said he would not issue a formal complaint, however, because the episode was a one-time incident. But he stressed that an NLRB complaint will be issued if there is any repetition of such meetings without agreement from the union.

In Senate Tax Bill:

New Loopholes Set, Reform Weakened

the tax proposals of the Administration, which would have provided bigger reductions for wealthy taxpayers and lower taxes for corporations.

The Senate rejected, usually by big margins, a number of amendments aimed at doing a better job of closing loopholes.

It voted down a proposal by Sen. Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.) to tighten a loophole-closing provision aimed at "hobby farmers"—businessmen who claim huge tax deductions on alleged farm losses—and then went on to approve an amendment giving a special tax break to horse breeders.

The Senate rejected an amendment by Sen. Joseph D. Tydings (D-Md.) which would have brought in $2.2 billion in revenue by taxing capital gains at death. And it voted down an effort by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) to disallow as a business expense penalties imposed for violation of antitrust laws.

It defeated, 51-25, a proposal to strengthen the bill's "minimum tax" on wealthy individuals who otherwise would escape taxation. The amendment, by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), would have added $480 million to the revenue side of the bill.

And it adopted a tax credit provision for college tuition which would be most beneficial to upper-income families and result in an estimated $1.9 billion a year loss in tax revenue—substantially more than the cost of the government's entire college aid.

One of the major tax loopholes the Senate refused to close allows doctors, lawyers and other professionals to deduct from their federal income tax all the money they put away for their personal retirement.

The Senate also added several unrelated "riders" to the tax bill—as a means of expressing the sentiment of the Senate even if they are dropped in conference. One such rider, adopted by a 65-30 vote, would authorize the President to impose quotas when an import threatened a domestic product.

Still in the Senate bill, however, are a number of tax reform measures designed to reach at least a portion of the billions of dollars of untaxed income that escapes through loopholes in the present law.

Some are stronger than the provisions of the House-passed bill; others are weaker.

There appeared to be general agreement that the final version of the tax bill put together by a mostly conservative House-Senate conference committee would bring new revenue and tax reductions more closely in balance than in the Senate bill.

The conferees could accomplish this to a large extent by taking the strongest loophole-closing provisions of the two bills to increase the revenue portion. Or they could go along with the Administration approach and cut back or stretch out tax relief for low and middle income families.

Both the House and Senate versions would repeal the general 7 percent investment tax credit—with a number of exceptions—and would extend the income tax surcharge at a 5 percent rate for the first six months of 1970.

FAR-RANGING ISSUES affecting manpower operations and the nation are reviewed during a quarterly meeting of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee. This was the first meeting presided over by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Frederick O'Neal, center right, now acting chairman of the committee. The committee also heard reports on activities of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, building trades employment situations and regional civil rights developments.

House Scraps Voting Rights Law, Adopts Administration Substitute

The House voted to scrap the 1965 Voting Rights Act and substitute the Nixon Administration proposal to ban literacy tests in all 50 states and abolish close supervision of the Deep South states which in the past used subterfuge and intimidation to keep Negroes from voting.

Extension of the 1965 law, which has doubled Negro voting registration in the target southern states was strongly supported by the AFL-CIO, every major civil rights organization and a large, bipartisan majority of the House Judiciary Committee.

But by a narrow 208-203 margin, the House voted for the Administration substitute. The bill now goes to the Senate, where the battle will be renewed.

The Administration—in what some saw as an extension of its "southern strategy"—claimed the present law is discriminatory against the South and no longer needed.

Its substitute bill would scrap the system of federal registrars and allow states and cities to change voting laws—or require reregistration of voters—without getting advance approval from the Justice Dept. or a federal court.

In a letter to House members, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said the issue of abolishing all literacy tests should be considered separately from the urgent issue of extension of the 1965 law.

House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford, armed with a letter from Pres. Nixon, personally led the fight for approval of the Administration's substitute bill.

But the ranking Republican on the House Judiciary Committee, Rep. William M. McCulloch of Ohio, was allied with Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) in fighting for the extension of the present law.

The House narrowly preserved the nation's foreign aid program, approving a heavily-cut $1.65 billion appropriation by a 200-195 vote after a sharp eight-hour debate.

Of the total, $1.2 billion is earmarked for economic aid to developing nations and America's allies—compared with the $2.2 billion requested by Pres. Nixon.

The military aid portion was slightly above the budget estimate as the House added additional funds for Nationalist China and South Korea.

Despite the cut — which brought the total below last year's appropriation to the lowest level in the program's history—most Republicans voted against the measure and 121 Democratic votes were necessary to pass it.

Further progress on the bill is temporarily blocked since the Senate must first pass an authorization bill before acting on the actual appropriation.

The additional military funds, which the Administration did not request but did not oppose, brought a few vote switches each way. Some congressmen who had been unfriendly to foreign aid requests went along with the bill because of the additions, and some who had voted for past aid bills opposed passage after the extra military money was added on floor amendments.

The House appeared headed for still another major battle—over extension of the anti-poverty program of the Office of Economic Opportunity.

Awaiting action by the House was a bill coming from the Education & Labor Committee extending the Economic Opportunity Act for two years, as requested by the Administration, and authorizing modest increases in several of its programs.

A "states' rights" coalition led by Rep. Albert Quie (R-Minn.) and Rep. Edith Green (D-Ore.) prepared a substitute bill which would turn over most programs to the states, bypassing both the cities where the need is greatest and the federal government's role.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. David Sullivan, chairman of OEO's Labor Advisory Committee, warned in a letter to all House members that the substitute bill "would make the war on poverty an ineffective exercise that would serve only to further frustrate those at the lowest end of our economic ladder."

Federal Action Sought On Auto Insurance

Growing abuses in auto insurance can best be curbed through federal regulation of the industry, the Ohio AFL-CIO told Congress.

"If the federal government chooses not to regulate," State AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Warren J. Smith testified, "then there should at least be minimum regulatory standards established for the state agencies.

"These standards should insure effective regulation which would produce reasonable rates and the complete availability of auto insurance for all drivers."

Smith appeared before a Senate Judiciary subcommittee which is holding hearings into the mounting grievances of auto insurance policyholders throughout the country.

The state labor official, accompanied by Stewart R. Jaffy, counsel for the Ohio AFL-CIO, detailed the federation's long fight for fair auto insurance at the administrative, court and legislative levels.

Smith and Jaffy cited a "fantastic" 41.7 percent increase in auto insurance rates in Ohio since November 1966. Increases have been granted by the state, they said, even though the companies are raking in huge profits on investments.

The Ohio Dept. of Insurance, Smith charged, has "aligned itself with the insurance industry in its operations and in its thinking."

As for the industry, Smith said, "it too long has ignored the rights of policyholders, and its too-late attempts to gain a good public image are unconvincing."

The industry's call for "free competition, less regulation by the states and no regulation by the federal government is as unconvincing as the smokescreen it tries to throw around the profits it makes," he added.

Stopgap Social Security Benefit Hike Held Sure

hike an increase in the minimum social security benefit which would raise it from $55 a month to $100 a month for a single person and from $82.50 to $150 for a retired couple. It also voted a guarantee that at least part of the increase would go to persons on welfare whose payments would otherwise be reduced as their social security benefits went up.

To finance the added cost, the taxable wage base would be gradually raised.

Later, the Senate added another amendment that would allow persons to start drawing social security retirement benefits at age 60 at a reduced rate. But that provision—even if accepted by the House—would go into effect only if the President directed it as a means of expanding consumer purchasing power.

Like other Senate amendments to the tax bill, the fate of the social security changes rests with a House-Senate conference committee. House conferees will be headed by Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), who has indicated his opposition to any social security changes beyond the 15 percent benefit hike at this time.

Still uncertain is whether the final version of the increase will go to the President as part of the tax bill or in the separate legislation initiated by the House.

One reason the Administration has sought a smaller and later increase is its impact on the budget. Even though there is money to pay for the 15 percent hike in the social security fund, the payout would show up as an expenditure and cut into the budget surplus the President is anxious to attain. But a Senate motion to substitute the smaller Administration-proposed benefit increase was roundly beaten, 56-34. The higher minimums were added by a 48-41 vote, and the entire package was adopted as part of the tax bill by a 73-14 vote.

The 15 percent increase is "desperately needed by the elderly," Pres. Nelson H. Cruikshank of the National Council of Senior Citizens said.

He urged Congress to pass the stopgap legislation quickly and then turn to updating of the social security and Medicare programs "along the lines of the Gilbert bill."

Nixon Signs Savings Bond Interest Hike

Labor-backed legislation increasing the interest on U.S. Savings Bonds sold to individuals from 4.25 to 5 percent has been signed into law by Pres. Nixon.

Under the law, the Treasury Dept. would pay the 5 percent interest rate on bonds issued after June 1, 1969, and for interest periods after that date on bonds issued before then.

Sales of Freedom Shares which already pay 5 percent interest will be discontinued after June 30, 1970. The delay will give workers who buy shares through payroll saving plans an opportunity to change deduction programs to Savings Bonds.

In calling for the 5 percent interest rate on bonds, the recent AFL-CIO convention pledged labor's continued support for the bond program under payroll deductions "if we can assure workers that their patriotic purchase of these bonds will bring them a fair return on their investment."

GE Strikers Strengthened By Wide Boycott Support

GENERAL ELECTRIC'S MASQUERADE at the negotiating table is met with a parade of masked pickets outside the GE offices in downtown Washington. Participating in the march are members of the Musicians, Government Employes, Laborers, Office & Professional Employes and the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

Meany Hails Solidarity, Cooperation

By Duane Emme

A tide of public support for labor's boycott of General Electric products mounted across the country while contributions to the fund to aid 150,000 GE strikers climbed steadily higher.

Pointing to the unprecedented labor solidarity on and behind the picket lines, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urged GE "to do some serious thinking and come up with a realistic offer."

"I have never seen anything approaching the cooperation we are receiving both from the labor movement and the public as a whole," Meany declared.

"GE can't break the unions," he added. "It is not producing. It is hurting its stockholders and customers with its intransigence."

As the walkout of 13 unions against the nation's largest and wealthiest electrical corporation moved through its eighth week, there were these other developments:

Senate Hike In School Aid Defies Nixon

The Senate defied a presidential scolding and voted big increases in the amount the Administration had sought for aid to education and other key domestic programs.

The House had already voted $1 billion more than the budget request for education and the Senate upped the figure still further.

But the President hinted that he might not let the money be spent in a tough letter to congressional leaders asking that government spending be held down "no matter what the cost in political popularity."

In a related development, a Republican congressman told the House he was "authorized" to say that Pres. Nixon may veto a strong coal mine health and safety bill because of the cost of special workmen's compensation for victims of "black lung" disease.

The House ignored the warning and voted overwhelmingly for final passage of the bill.

Nixon said his hopes for a budget surplus to curb inflation are endangered by pending legislation including the higher amounts for education.

He cited also a federal employe pay raise that he termed "premature," a 15 percent hike in social security benefits "in place of my 10 percent recommendation" and new legislation "to benefit veterans, children and others."

Besides, he said, his budget estimates have already been upset by "uncontrollable" items such as higher interest on the national debt.

The most pointed congressional rebuttal to the President came from the Senate Appropriations Committee.

Its report, accompanying a $20 billion appropriations bill for most of the nation's domestic programs, was issued several days before Nixon's letter. But it met the issue head-on.

While agreeing that overall spending should be held down to combat inflation, the committee stressed that: "We do not believe that this should be accomplished at the expense of vital domestic programs."

"Cuts in education, health research and economic opportunity programs can't be justified by gen-

Retains Federal Control:

House Extends Life Of Poverty Agency

The federal anti-poverty program won a new lease on life and the House conservative coalition took a licking when it attempted to turn the program over to the states.

By a 276-117 vote, the House extended the life of the Office of Economic Opportunity and the anti-poverty programs it administers for an additional two years. The labor-backed bill also increased the spending ceilings for several programs, including Head Start, by $295 million over the Administration's budget request.

But the key vote came in the 231-163 defeat of a state control plan drafted by Rep. Albert H. Quie (R-Minn.) and Rep. Edith Green (D-Ore.)—and backed by the House Republican leadership and most conservative southern Democrats.

It was the same coalition that just the day before had killed a House bill to extend the Voting Rights Act.

This time, only 103 Republicans and 60 Democrats voted to turn the clock back on a major accomplishment of the Johnson Administration. Voting to continue the war on poverty without drastic change were 168 Democrats and 63 Republicans.

The Senate passed a similar bill in October, marred only by the amendment of Sen. George Murphy (R-Calif.) giving governors an absolute veto over OEO legal services for the poor in their states. Under present law, the OEO director can override a gubernatorial veto.

House Vote Assures Social Security Raise

The House voted 397-0 to raise all social security benefits 15 percent as of Jan. 1, with not a single congressional voice being raised for the Administration proposal of a 10 percent raise starting in April.

The Senate had included a 15 percent increase, along with several further improvements, in the tax reform bill now being put in final shape by a House-Senate conference committee.

During the brief House debate on the bill, Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) renewed his promise that other changes in the social security program will be considered by the committee as its first order of business in January, the start of the second session of Congress.

The committee will deal, he said, with "the entire Social Security Act, old age and survivors insurance, disability insurance, hospital insurance, sup-

Opera Unions Ratify Pacts, Met to Reopen

New York—The Metropolitan Opera, darkened for three months by disputes with unions representing several hundred employes, will open Dec. 29 with Giuseppe Verdi's "Aida."

Rehearsals for a new season got underway after chorus members, ballet dancers, soloists, musicians and stage and service employes ratified new three-year contracts.

"Aida" was originally scheduled to open the Met season on Sept. 15. But soloists, choristers and musicians boomed out the words and music from picket lines that day instead of in Lincoln Center as had been planned.

The unions emphasized that their members were outside because management had locked them out after balking at negotiations on contract proposals advanced as far back as last spring.

Some of the unions had been under five-year contracts accepted only as a means of easing relocation of the Met from the old Metropolitan Opera House to Lincoln Center.

The unions insisted on improvements for their members that would compensate for the erosion of wages and benefits caused by soaring price increases during their long contracts.

In early October, after the bar-

NLRB Orders Election for Baseball Umps

The 24 baseball umpires in the American League will be allowed to vote on whether they want to join the union formed by their fellow umpires in the National League.

The election was ordered by the National Labor Relations Board in response to a petition filed last summer asking that the NLRB take jurisdiction over professional sports involving both players and umpires.

The NLRB decision that it has jurisdiction over baseball labor disputes could have an effect on baseball's traditional immunity from antitrust laws. That immunity was based on a 1922 Supreme Court decision involving the Baltimore Orioles of the Federal League in which the court said baseball was

MULTI-UNION mobilization presses the boycott of General Electric products outside several department stores at New York City's Herald Square, including Macy's. The pickets made their appeal to Christmas shoppers to refrain from buying the GE labels, including Hotpoint and Universal products. Among the participating unions were the State, County & Municipal Employes, Ladies' Garment Workers, the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Despite NLRB Delay:

High Court Blocks Cuts in Back Pay

Long delay by the National Labor Relations Board in deciding a case going back more than 15 years did not justify a court's reduction of the board's back-pay order, the Supreme Court declared.

By a 5-3 decision, the court ordered J. H. Rutter-Rex Mfg. Co. to pay 171 employes $160,000 in back pay growing out of an April 1954 strike by the Clothing Workers at the firm's plant in New Orleans.

In 1956, the board ruled that the strike was due to management's refusal to bargain in good faith. Rutter-Rex was ordered to bargain with the union and reinstate with back pay all strikers who sought reinstatement.

Before the order was issued, however, the strike had ended and the company and the union had arranged for the reinstatement of some, but not all, of the workers involved.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the NLRB's order in 1957, but it was not until November 1961 that the agency issued a supplemental order deciding that 207 employes hadn't been reinstated and were due about $342,000 in back pay.

After the court refused a company move to block the order, there were further NLRB proceedings, and in 1966 the board decided the firm still owed 171 workers back pay through June 30, 1961, with pay for the succeeding period to be decided later.

Rutter-Rex went back to the court, claiming it should not have to pay anything. The appeals court rejected this contention. But it decided back pay should be cut off as of July 1, 1959, because of "inordinate delay" by the board between 1957 and 1961.

The court cited as the basis for its decision a section of the Administrative Procedures Act which says a federal agency "shall proceed with reasonable dispatch to conclude any matter presented to it."

In appealing to the Supreme Court, the NLRB pointed out that the four-year "time lag" was the result of an extremely heavy caseload at a time when it didn't have a large enough staff.

It also argued that neither the act nor any other law permits the courts to penalize a regulatory agency or workers who have back pay coming.

The court's majority decision, written by Justice Thurgood Marshall, charged the appeals court with "an unwarranted interference" with the board's remedial power.

As deplorable as an NLRB delay may be, the majority said, it is even more deplorable "if innocent employes had to live some years on reduced incomes as a combined result of the delay and the company's illegal failure to reinstate them."

The court's choosing of July 1, 1959, as an "arbitrary date" for a cutoff in back pay "left the employes who had not been reinstated by that date worse off than they would have been but for the company's wrongful action," Marshall said.

Even assuming, though not deciding, that the board did not comply with the Administrative Procedures Act, Marshall said, it does not follow that the NLRB abused its discretion in issuing its order.

"Wronged employes," he concluded, "are at least as much injured by the board's delay in collecting their backpay as is the wrongdoing employer."

A dissent, written by Justice William O. Douglas for himself, Chief Justice Warren E. Burger and Justice John M. Harlan, contended that the appeals court properly exercised responsibility to assure "that the board keeps within reasonable bounds.

Knoxville Council Gets Outreach Pact

Knoxville, Tenn. — The Knoxville Building & Construction Trades Council has received a new one-year Labor Dept. contract for $50,985 to prepare 35 minority youths for skilled trades apprenticeships.

In an earlier Apprenticeship Outreach contract, the Knoxville council prepared 78 young men for the apprentice examinations, more than double its original goal of 35.

The Outreach instructors will continue to counsel and assist the young men who pass their trades examinations throughout their apprenticeships.

Parallel to GE Struggle Seen in Student Unrest

Atlanta—The struggle by General Electric workers to overcome "Boulwarism" is similar to the fight many college students are waging against paternalistic school administrations, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman told the national conference of the National Association of Student Governments.

When college administrators use their authority as a substitute for parents to deny students a voice in decisions affecting their lives, they are using tactics similar to GE's "take-it-or-leave-it" attitude toward collective bargaining, Slaiman said.

"At GE the doctrine 'in loco parentis' goes by another name—Boulwarism," Slaiman told the students. "It means simply that the company knows best. Therefore, there is no need to bargain with the workers' union."

He said the attitude of the GE workers to this failure to bargain is the same as students have to a university that refuses to allow any joint student-faculty committees on any aspect of campus life.

Slaiman spoke to a group of some 800 delegates to the sixth national conference of the NASG, which represents some 3 million students who describe themselves as more moderate than the National Student Association, from which it split off.

In tracing the goals and accomplishments of the labor movement, Slaiman emphasized that political democracy and a free trade union movement are mutually dependent.

"So we in the labor movement are rather sensitive about this question of democracy," Slaiman said. "And we react strongly to ideologies and movements that seek to undermine existing democratic institutions in the name of a 'higher democracy.'

"We have such a movement today in the so-called new left," Slaiman said. "In the name of participatory democracy, it has arrogated to itself the right to make history for the rest of us.

"Like GE, the new left feels it represents the real interests of the workers. Like the plantation owners, it feels it knows what the Negroes want—separatism. Like the most paternalistic college administrators it feels it speaks for all the students"

Similarly, Slaiman told the students that the struggle for democracy was at the root of the AFL-CIO's position on Viet Nam. Contrasting North and South Viet Nam, Slaiman said, "In the South a beginning has been made—inadequate though it may be—toward democratic elections. In the North there are no elections.

"In the South, there is an independent trade union movement. In the North there is none. In the South, political dissenters are frequently jailed. In the North they are destroyed."

COPE Area Post Goes To Charles McMahon

Charles McMahon has been appointed COPE area director for the states of New Jersey and New York.

McMahon, 38, has been a member of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers for 20 years and has been a member of the executive board of IBEW Local 26.

Construction Trades Easing Housing Crisis

Building trades unions are committed to helping low-income families obtain adequate housing and also to advancing modern home building techniques, an article in the 1969 Housing Yearbook points out.

The writer, Boris Shishkin, is secretary of the AFL-CIO housing committee and a director of the National Housing Conference, publisher of the yearbook.

The record, Shishkin declares, shows that the building trades were a "prime mover" in helping secure low-rent public housing 35 years ago and have since backed "every policy and plan to enhance the housing opportunities for the less fortunate."

Noting that AFL-CIO affiliates were sponsoring some 230 housing projects for low-income families by mid-1969, Shishkin adds, "National and international unions in the building trades and local building trades councils have played a prominent part in sponsoring such projects."

Regarding new construction techniques, Shishkin cites numerous examples of building trades unions and councils entering into agreements covering prefabricated housing.

He also cites a 1967 survey of prefabrication made by Battelle Memorial Institute of Columbus, O., which was financed by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. to help unions develop "informed and reasonable approaches to problems raised by this new technology."

Boulware's Cousin Backs Striking GE Union 100%

Louisville, Ky.—He's not denying it and he's not bragging about it either—but the truth is that GE striker D. Hardin Radcliffe is a cousin of Lemuel R. Boulware. Boulware is the retired vice president of General Electric after whom the corporation's "take-it-or-leave-it" bargaining tactic is named.

Radcliffe has been a member of Local 761 of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers since he began working at Appliance Park in the fifties.

In fact, Lemuel Boulware helped him get his job, says Radcliffe.

Down in Kentucky—where tracing geneology is a state pastime—they say Lem Boulware is Radcliffe's first cousin once-removed. Boulware is the son of Radcliffe's grandfather's sister, Mattie Ricketts Boulware. Lemuel Boulware was born in Springfield, Ky. and Radcliffe was born in Eminence, Ky.

The two met on only one occasion, says Radcliffe, "back in 1940-something, when his uncle—my grandfather's brother—died. I met him at the funeral home."

After that, said Radcliffe, he contacted his cousin about a job when Appliance Park opened and received a letter of recommendation from him.

Now that his fellow strikers know about his famous relative, Radcliffe gets a lot of kidding on the picket line but he still says, "I'm backing the union 100 percent."

Meany Hails Solidarity:

GE Strikers Strengthened As Public Supports Boycott

been made to the GE strike relief fund with every segment of the American labor contributing.

- The AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee began supplementing the federation's boycott with newspaper advertisements in 20 major U.S. cities.
- Federal mediators held separate bargaining talks with both sides but there were no reports of any progress on key issues. The company again rejected the unions' proposal to submit all issues to binding arbitration.
- The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers accused GE of "blackmail" in threatening to withhold "already earned" 1969 third-week vacation pay until strikers return to their jobs.

Meany issued a statement after meeting with the CBC, which includes leaders of the 10 AFL-CIO unions having GE contracts. Meany serves as CBC chairman and James Compton heads its steering committee.

Every report received by CBC, Meany said, proves that "the strike and boycott are growing stronger week by week." He noted that "even production workers who are not union members are observing picket lines."

Citing CBC reports that supervisors and other non-union groups were contributing money to pickets, Meany added, "One would think that GE management might have second thoughts about its position when its own people support the strike."

Kirkland reported that two other unions have achieved the $1-a-member goal in contributing to the strikers' aid fund: The Glass & Ceramic Workers with a contribution of $33,622 and the Allied Industrial Workers, contributing $87,453.

Earlier, the Seafarers gave $100,000 to the fund and the Glass Bottle Blowers contributed $70,000 to put them over the goal set by the AFL-CIO Executive Council in starting the fund.

Kirkland also announced receipt of $10,000 for the fund from the unaffiliated Plant Guard Workers, whose president, James C. McGahey said, "we certainly know the rough fight" the GE unions are having.

In announcing CBC's new ads, Compton said they were a modest approach to explain the boycott and urge support of it in contrast to "massive advertising expenditures" by GE.

"Our best estimate," he added, "is that its new rash of full-page ads this week has brought GE's outlay to at least $1.5 million, or more than $10 for every striker, not including ads placed by local GE managements."

The unions' ads, directed to consumers, emphasized that workers are striking GE because they want "decent wages and improved working conditions," but that so far the firm "hasn't come close to making a realistic offer on pay and other issues."

The ads further pointed out that "GE talks a lot about inflation but it has just raised prices again even though its 1969 third-quarter profits were 11 percent ahead of last year."

The unions said their members want to get back to work and will "as soon as GE proposes the kind of contract terms . . . that will give us the wages and safeguards that we and our families need."

Consumers can "help us get an early settlement," the unions concluded, by not buying GE products—including Hotpoint and Universal-GE—"until our strike is over."

Reports pouring into the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Organizing in Washington and CBC's headquarters in New York indicate that boycott demonstrations in front of department stores and other outlets for GE products are sweeping through the country.

What's more, CBC said, "hundreds of merchants, large and small, are cooperating by taking GE products from their shelves and cutting off GE ads."

"The response has been so good," a CBC spokesman stated, "that it suggests that GE is just as miserable to customers as it is to workers."

The boycott has been so effective in the Twin Cities (Minneapolis-St. Paul) that no major department or appliance store is advertising or displaying GE products, a continuing AFL-CIO survey indicates.

In Detroit, where more than 100,000 "don't buy" handbills have been circulated in the downtown area, a number of stores including J. L. Hudson, have announced they will not advertise or promote GE's products.

In Shreveport, La., the G. C. Murphy stores, Shreve Center Shopping Center and Thibodaux Furniture Co. took GE products from their shelves. In Rockford, Ill., four stores removed GE products from sale.

When union members picketed Woodward & Lothrop's downtown store in Washington, D.C., shoppers asked for boycott pins and began handing out boycott literature themselves.

Chicago was another city that passed the 100,000 mark in handbill distribution downtown. Unions there also erected a giant "Don't Buy" GE billboard at a key location on Congress Expressway. In Louisville, handbill distribution was reaching the 30,000-a-day mark.

The Arkansas AFL-CIO said picketing has been established in every city of more than 10,000 population. Nearly every state federation was participating in the boycott. Baltimore, Houston, Fort Worth, Indianapolis, Los Angeles and New York unions, among others, reported highly-favorable responses to boycott demonstrations.

Students at the University of Wisconsin's branch in Milwaukee collected funds for strikers from a "Support GE Strikers" booth on campus. Students at Holy Cross, Boston University and Rutgers protested against GE recruiters on their campus.

Three employes of Superior Plating Co., Minneapolis, were laid off for refusing to work on material sent from a GE plant in Lynchburg, Va. Later the company rehired the men and announced it would not work on any more parts from GE.

Hildebrand Gets Seat On ILO Governing Body

George H. Hildebrand, deputy under secretary of labor for international affairs, has been named by Pres. Nixon as U.S. representative on the governing body of the International Labor Organization. It is the executive council of the ILO.

Hildebrand, who was appointed an under secretary in May, succeeds George L-P Weaver.

FIRST $1 MILLION CHECK to aid General Electric strikers is presented by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee. The committee is represented by James Compton, right, of the Electric, Radio & Machine Workers, CBC steering committee chairman, and Richard Mills of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, CBC steering committee treasurer.

Rail Shop Pact Vetoed, Bargaining to Resume

The Labor Dept. planned renewed efforts to resolve a dispute between four shopcraft unions and the railroads after one of the unions rejected a tentative agreement.

Members of the Sheet Metal Workers voted down a wage-rules agreement reached Dec. 4 following lengthy negotiations. In the late stages, bargaining was conducted at the Labor Dept. under the direction of Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz and Assistant Sec. of Labor W. J. Usery, Jr.

Although members of the Machinists, Boilermakers, and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers voted to accept the proposal, it had been agreed earlier that all four must ratify it to become effective.

Shultz said he was "naturally disappointed" by the Sheet Metal Workers' failure to ratify and that he would "discuss with my associates and with the parties possible next steps to achieve a final resolution" of the dispute. The unions have been trying to achieve a settlement for more than a year.

The tentative agreement provided wage increases in 1969 and 1970 totaling 68 cents for 40,000 workers who are journeymen in their crats. Another 8,000 members of the unions, in less skilled jobs, would have received slightly lower increases.

The agreement also called for new doubletime rates for shopmen working a seventh consecutive day and new rules covering advance notice on the size of work forces and the assignment of jobs.

Sheet Metal Workers Vice Pres. J. W. O'Brien said he believed opposition to the latter rule, which would permit limited crossing of craft lines, was the main reason why members of his union turned down the proposal.

The unions had sought a 10 percent general increase and a separate boost of 20 cents an hour for skilled workers. The carriers offered only a 5 percent general pay raise and demanded numerous new restrictions on rules.

A presidential emergency board recommended a 5 percent general increase and a separate raise of 20 cents an hour for "more skilled" employes. However, its skill definition would have covered only 25 percent of the workers.

During deadline negotiations, the unions had indicated they would strike two or three railroads, if necessary to get a settlement. They said such action would avoid a "national emergency." However, the carriers threatened a lockout on all major railroads if there were any strike at all.

Although the unions are now free to strike under the terms of the Railway Labor Act, they did not immediately announce any strike plans.

IAM Vice Pres. William W. Winpisinger, spokesman for the unions during the bargaining, called upon the carriers to resume negotiations "not later than Jan. 6" to see if a new agreement can be negotiated.

"I'm fairly confident we can work this thing out," Winpisinger said. "We're not talking about a strike, at this point anyway."

BILLBOARD ADVERTISING helps bring the labor message to Chicago shoppers as an informational picket line prepares to distribute "Don't Buy GE" leaflets. The union Santa Claus later led the pickets down Chicago's State Street and the department store row.

Dayton's Fire Fighters Extend Special Service

Dayton—Union fire fighters here are doing more than putting out fires and saving people from burning buildings. They are now coming to the rescue of people with personal and family problems.

This additional volunteer effort of the Fire Fighters was launched a year ago when the union set out to train its members for community counseling service.

Today, 397 Dayton Fire Fighters have completed the training under the program sponsored by the IAFF and the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services.

Their training has enabled the volunteers to make each of the city's fire stations a place where people with problems can go for information and referral services about social and welfare programs and agencies.

In many cases, the Fire Fighters are able to make appointments with the proper agency and cut through delays and red tape. Many citizens—particularly those in the lowest-income areas of the city—have only scant knowledge of the services available to them.

Since the Fire Fighters are on duty around the clock, the volunteer social service they have set up allows people to call or come in any time of day or night with their problems.

PELTED BY A WINTRY BLAST, union pickets stand their ground at the Nicollet Mall in Minneapolis to inform Christmas shoppers of the General Electric boycott. The snowstorm dumped 12 inches on the city, but informational picket line continued to hand out leaflets.

Seasonal Construction Layoffs Laid To Customs as Much as Weather

Every winter the construction industry goes into semi-hibernation, putting thousands of men out of work.

Despite major advances in recent years that allow construction operations to continue through sub-freezing weather conditions, the seasonality of the industry still persists.

An article in the December issue of the Labor Dept. magazine, Monthly Labor Review, says the problem must be blamed on traditional management practices and customs as much as on the thermometer.

The article is based on the findings of a Bureau of Labor Statistics study of construction industry seasonality and manpower problems that will be published early next year.

Higher Jobless Rate

It notes that the construction labor force suffers much more unemployment than workers in other industries.

"From 1960 to 1968," the article points out, "the unemployment rate for private wage and salary workers in construction averaged 11.1 percent, in comparison with a rate of 5.2 percent for all private wage and salary workers."

"Paradoxically, each summer complaints arise of labor shortages from contractors," MLR says, "and the volume of complaints increases as the pace aggregate activity quickens."

The authors of the article, Joe L. Russell and Michael J. Pilot, report that seasonality accounts for much of the underutilization of the construction labor force.

Geography is often a factor in the manpower problems of the industry. A surplus of construction manpower may exist in one locality while a shortage is apparent in another, the article says.

"Unlike a manufacturing concern that can locate in an area with available manpower, a contractor must either bring his workers to the building site, or find new workers in the area.

"Shortages of construction labor are often found in geographic areas where there have been relatively few opportunities for these workers in the recent past. When construction activity decreases in a locality, many construction workers take jobs in other local industries."

The unemployment rate for construction workers is usually the highest of any major industry division, and this is a reason for the higher hourly wages for the trades, the authors note.

Even when the industry is operating at peak capacity, the unemployment rate in construction is significantly higher than in other industries.

"In 1968, the unemployment rate in construction averaged 6.9 percent, nearly double the 3.6 percent rate for nonagricultural industries as a whole," Russell and Pilot reported.

They note, too, that even during the tight labor market of 1953, when the average jobless rate for all industries was 2.8 percent, the unemployment level in construction was 6.2 percent.

Rate Fluctuates

Employment in construction peaks generally in August and the peak month for unemployment in the industry is February. The employment rates between these two months have fluctuated as much as 30 percent within the last six years, the article reports.

Even though the fluctuation was only 19.9 percent in 1968, the article says there has been no great change in seasonality since 1947.

"Seasonal employment movements in construction are the result of inclement weather and the traditional management practices and customs," Russell and Pilot observe.

"The exact amount of work that could be performed in winter with precautions against bad weather is unknown, but indications are that it is more than is currently performed."

As far back as 1924, a government study found that "for most types of construction it is now possible to build the year-round in all parts of the United States." The Secretary of Commerce at that time, Herbert Hoover, wrote, "Bad weather is not the principal cause of seasonal idleness. Customs which became fixed when builders had not yet learned how to cope with adverse weather conditions have not yet been changed. . . ."

Techniques Available

Back in this decade, the Canadians have poured concrete at 40 degrees below zero, the article notes, and American contractors have accomplished similar feats.

"Materials and techniques for performing construction during harsh weather have been available for some time, and have steadily improved. Careful scheduling and protection of materials and workers can permit work to proceed in periods of bad weather," the authors suggest.

Congress Lowers Rail Crew Hours

Congress cleared for the President's signature a labor-backed bill lowering the maximum number of hours railroad crews can be required to work in a single shift.

The present legal limit of 16 hours, set in 1907, would drop to 14 hours after one year and to 12 hours in three years.

New requirements for time off between shifts are also set by the legislation.

NLRB Asserts Jurisdiction:

Baseball Umpires To Vote on Union

involved in commerce, but was not interstate by its nature.

In issuing its decision, the NLRB mentioned the 1922 ruling, but said "subsequent Supreme Court decisions appear to proceed on the assumption that baseball, like other major pro sports, is now an industry in or affecting interstate commerce."

The NLRB ordered the umpires' representation election to be held before Jan. 15 in Boston, site of the American League headquarters.

The ruling grew out of a case involving two veteran American League umpires, Al Salerno and Bill Valentine, who were fired just before the end of the 1968 season. American League Pres. Joe Cronin said the discharges were for "incompetence," but the two umpires contended they were fired for trying to organize the American League umpires into an association similar to the one in the National League.

The Association of National Baseball League Umpires, which was formed in 1963, was the petitioner before the NLRB on behalf of the American League umpires.

The AFL-CIO filed a brief in support of the umpires in which Associate General Counsel Thomas E. Harris said it would be absurd for the NLRB not to take jurisdiction, since baseball's labor affairs would then be subject to the law of whatever state the team was in at the moment—starting with Florida law during spring training.

"While baseball is entertainment, we don't think its labor relations should be reduced to comedy," Harris said.

The lone dissenter in the NLRB decision was Howard Jenkins, Jr., who said he did not think Congress intended to include baseball disputes within the reach of NLRB jurisdiction. "If any inference is to be drawn from congressional silence on the matter," he added.

The four NLRB members who signed the majority ruling were Chairman Frank W. McCulloch, John H. Fanning, Gerald A. Brown and Sam Zagoria.

In opposing the umpires' petition before the NLRB, the American League had contended that because of baseball's internal self-regulation, a labor dispute is not likely to have any substantial effect on interstate commerce.

The NLRB rejected that argument because the self-regulating system "appears to have been designed almost entirely by employers and owners." The system relies finally on arbitration by the baseball commissioner, the NLRB pointed out, and the commissioner is hired by the owners.

Similarly, the NLRB dismissed an American League contention that the board should not take jurisdiction because the issue has become international in scope since Montreal got a major league franchise. The league also argued that umpires are supervisory, but the NLRB responded that managers, not umpires, issue the instructions on how to bat or field or the exhortations to play harder.

Both Cronin and baseball Commissioner Bowie Kuhn refused comment on the NLRB decision. But Richard Moss, lawyer for the players' association, said the decision would apply to all professional sports and "for the first time makes it clear that professional athletes have the protection of the labor laws."

Rep. Alexander Pirnie (R-N.Y.), in whose district Salerno lives, said the next step on behalf of Valentine and Salerno would be briefs before the NLRB about the nature of their dismissal. "This paves the way for justice," for the two umpires, Pirnie said.

A damage suit the two umpires had filed against organized baseball was dismissed by a federal court one week before the NLRB decision.

The argument over whether baseball should enjoy immunity from antitrust regulations is of particular importance because of baseball's "reserve clause" through which a player is bound to one club for the duration of his career.

Other professional sports have never been considered to have such an immunity and consequently allow a player to become a free agent by "playing out his option" after giving one year's notice. However, the player may not sign with a new club until his previous club has been compensated.

Baseball has argued that without the reserve clause, players would flock to the wealthier clubs and leave the leagues badly unbalanced.

Metropolitan to Reopen with 'Aida' As Opera Unions Ratify New Pacts

gaining snag at the Met continued, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany asked Pres. Harry Van Arsdale of the New York City AFL-CIO and presidents of unions involved to seek out "more constructive negotiations."

Although the Met is a local entity, Meany said, "it plays an important role in the cultural life of America as a whole" and labor "has the same stake as the public in its survival."

At the same time, he added, "the talents, skills and vital contributions of the performers, craftsmen and workers employed by the company must be fully recognized and rewarded."

In the talks that followed, mediator David L. Cole also participated at the request of Mayor John V. Lindsay. These were key terms in major new contracts that were described by union leaders as achieving important gains:

The Guild of Musical Artists, part of the Actors & Artists of America, won sizable gains in wages for soloists, choristers and ballet dancers.

Soloists' base pay will go from $200 to $280 a week in three yearly steps, with experienced soloists' getting base pay ranging from $300 to $375 a week.

Chorus members with six years seniority will get $215 a week in the first year, $230 the second and $250 the third. The previous contract had top pay of $194 a week for choristers with 19 years seniority.

Ballet dancers with three years seniority will receive $185 a week the first year, $200 the second and $215 the third. Their base pay had been a maximum of $140 a week for those with 10 years seniority.

The contract, covering 270 ballet dancers, choristers and soloists, also provides for a reduction in the workweek and additional pay for rehearsal hours.

Musicians Local 802, representing musicians, backstage conductors and librarians, won increases that will take the wage base from $260 to $325 a week during the life of the contract.

Other gains included hikes in rehearsal rates, a shorter workweek and an increase in added pay for weekly radio broadcasts of the opera.

The local's members were credited with scoring a break in the drawn-out dispute when they won a three-year settlement after rejecting the Met's proposal for a four-year contract.

Service Employes Local 54 announced that its agreement contains wage boosts that will raise the base of $90 a week to $130 over three years. It also reported improvements in life insurance coverage, a welfare plan and holidays.

Theatrical Stage Employes Local 1 said its new benefits and working conditions vary widely, but improvements are generally in accord with those won by the other unions.

Message to Congress:

Further Aid to Arts Supported by Nixon

Expanded federal aid for programs to enrich the nation's cultural life and broaden cultural opportunities has been urged by Pres. Nixon.

In a message to Congress, the President asked for a $40 million appropriation in fiscal 1971 for the National Foundation on the Arts & Humanities, more than double the amount allotted to it for fiscal 1970.

Nixon also urged Congress to extend for three years the life of the foundation, which makes grants to cultural causes through the National Endowment for the Arts. Without an extension, the foundation would expire June 30, 1970.

A resolution adopted by the recent AFL-CIO convention called for continued and strengthened support of the foundation as "a splendid example of what this nation can and must do to support the arts."

"The arts in a democracy must not be the playthings of the rich," the convention emphasized.

The resolution cited the growth in leisure time and mounting urbanization as making it increasingly important that opportunities be expanded for workers' involvement in the arts.

In asking Nixon to seek increased appropriations for endowing the arts and humanities, the delegates also appealed to Congress to provide the "maximum amount" of funds it authorizes.

The AFL-CIO took a leading role in the drive that led to creation of the foundation by Congress in 1965, and the federation is now engaged in promotion of the arts on a number of fronts.

Currently, the AFL-CIO has pilot projects aimed at stimulating union participation in the arts in five cities—New York, Los Angeles, Buffalo, Louisville and Minneapolis.

Both AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis, coordinator of the projects, and Harlowe F. Dean, the federation's consultant on them, praised Nixon's call for increased funds for cultural programs.

Dean noted that labor's pilot projects had been aided by a $40,000 grant from the Endowment for Arts for 1968 and 1969.

He further noted that the endowment recently granted $50,000 to the New York Philharmonic to aid a joint project of the orchestra and the New York City AFL-CIO to present a series of concerts for union members.

Labor also is participating in the work of the Associated Councils of the Arts, a private organization which coordinates state and community arts projects. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland serves on its board of directors.

Federation Vice Pres. Herman D. Kenin, who formerly served on the arts council of the foundation, has led in promotion of the arts among union members as head of the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes.

In his message, Nixon stressed that the richness of the nation's cultural life should be available to all citizens wherever they live.

There is a growing need, he said, for more federal assistance to the arts and humanities because private organizations do not have the necessary money and because of the increased demands for cultural opportunities.

"We are able now," he continued, "to use the nation's cultural resources in new ways—ways that can enrich the lives of more people in more communities than has ever before been possible."

The federal government has an obligation, Nixon concluded, "to help broaden the base of our cultural legacy . . . to make its diversity and insight more readily accessible to millions of people everywhere."

Hospital Unit Wins Pact at Johns Hopkins

Baltimore—The 1,472 non-professional employes at Johns Hopkins Hospital will receive a 40 percent increase in wages and benefits in a three-year contract negotiated by the Local 1199E of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

Union members were expected to ratify the pact as RWDSU officials noted they were "elated" over the wage and benefits package.

The contract is expected to set the pattern for negotiations in Baltimore's four other major hospitals where 1199E represents about 6,000 non-professional service and maintenance workers.

Accord was reached in the Johns Hopkins settlement with the assistance of federal mediators little more than 24 hours before the deadline of a threatened walkout.

The agreement provides for raising the minimum wage immediately from $1.80 to $2.10 an hour. Another increment will raise the wage to $2.35 after six months and to $2.50 an hour next Dec. 1. The wage scale will go to $2.70 on Dec. 1, 1971.

Other provisions call for welfare benefits and life insurance to be paid fully by the hospital. Pension fund contributions also will be made solely by the employer.

An extra floating holiday was granted, which most workers are expected to exercise on Martin Luther King, Jr.'s birthday, Jan. 15.

For work on holidays the wage rate was increased to 2.5 times the normal daily rate and the night shift differential was set at 15 cents an hour.

A modified form of union shop is included in the pact. It requires all new employes to join the union after a 60-day probationary period while present members must retain their membership.

Elliott Godoff, national director of the RWDSU's National Union of Hospital & Nursing Home Employes, attributed the success of the negotiations to the support of Baltimore area unions and the Negro community. He further cited the assistance of AFL-CIO representatives in the talks as a factor toward an improved settlement.

One day after the Hopkins agreement was reached, Local 1199E won the right to represent non-professional workers at the Greater Baltimore Medical Center by a vote of 272 to 164.

Baltimore's Provident Hospital is shortly expected to recognize the union as the bargaining representative for 150 non-professional employes there.

Cardcheck Ruling Cited In Orders to Bargain

The National Labor Relations Board, in line with a landmark decision of the Supreme Court, has reaffirmed previous orders requiring two firms to bargain with unions on the basis of representation determined by authorization cards.

The orders direct the Gissel Packing Co. plant at Huntington, W. Va., to bargain with Meat Cutters Local 347 and General Steel Products, Inc., to bargain with the Upholsterers at High Point, N.C.

In cases involving these employers, the Supreme Court in June unanimously upheld the right of the NLRB to order an employer to bargain on the basis of a cardcheck where he has unlawfully destroyed a union's majority.

The ruling struck down findings by the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals which had held that earlier NLRB orders to bargain were invalid because there was no certification election.

During proceedings before the Supreme Court, the AFL-CIO filed a brief supporting the NLRB and urging the court to decide in its favor.

The Supreme Court decision was described by AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher as vindicating labor's position that authorization cards are a "substantive part of the organizing process."

The high court in each case found that the employer had smashed the union's majority based on a show of authorization cards by threats of shutdowns and firings and by promises of future favors.

The decision, written by former Chief Justice Earl Warren, also emphasized that it has been "consistently accepted" by the courts that authorization cards are an acceptable means of establishing bargaining rights.

The cases were remanded to the board by the Supreme Court for further consideration in the light of certain guidelines set forth in the opinion.

In reaffirming its previous bargaining orders to the firms, the board summarized the court's ruling and decided that orders to bargain were justified by the guidelines.

It further found that both companies' unfair labor practices were "of such pervasive character" as to have actually made the cardcheck a more reliable measure of representation than a representation election would be.

The order to Gissel was reaffirmed by all five board members: Chairman Frank W. McCulloch, John H. Fanning, Gerald A. Brown, Howard Jenkins, Jr., and Sam Zagoria. The General Steel order was reaffirmed by a Fanning-Brown-Zagoria panel.

Finlay Allan Dies at 61, Key Carpenters' Official

Finlay C. Allan, 61, first vice president of the Carpenters died in a suburban Washington, D.C., hospital after a long illness. He had suffered a heart ailment.

Allan's record of service with his union spanned more than four decades and during that period he also served the labor movement and his community in a wide range of capacities.

He joined Carpenters' Local 337 in Detroit in 1929 and was elected its financial secretary in 1938. Two years later the local elected him business representative.

In 1941, he became secretary-treasurer of the Detroit Carpenters District Council and six years later was elected secretary-manager of the Detroit Building Trades Council, covering Michigan's Wayne, Oakland and Macomb counties. During nine years in that position, he served on the Detroit Housing Commission, the Wayne County Board of Supervisors, the governor's St. Lawrence Seaway Commission and the governor's Committee on Labor Legislation. During this time, he also was a delegate to an International Labor Organization conference in Rome.

Allan came to Washington in 1956 as special assistant to the Carpenters' president. He became second vice president in 1962 and was moved up to first vice president in 1964.

One of his main duties as first vice president was directing the union's apprenticeship and training programs under a special department established largely through his efforts.

He is survived by his wife, Mary, and two sons, David A. of Burlington, N.C., and Bruce A. of Seabrook, Md. Allan lived in Silver Spring, Md., and funeral services were held at the Colesville United Methodist Church there.

Retiring CSA Staffer Saluted in Camden

Camden, N.J.—Francis J. Coyle was saluted by the New Jersey AFL-CIO Community Services Committee here for 13 years of service as a CSA staff representative in the Northeast. He was presented the Camden Union Organization for Social Service and Camden Central Labor Union community service awards.

Coyle will retire Jan. 1 as the AFL-CIO CSA staff representative for 11 eastern states and the District of Columbia. He plans to remain active as a CSA volunteer for the Philadelphia-Camden area.

Jewish Group Backs Table Grape Boycott

Delano, Calif.—The Union of American Hebrew Congregations is the latest organization to pledge its full support for the boycott of California table grapes, Vice Pres. Gilbert Padilla of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee announced.

A resolution passed by UAHC at its 50th general assembly noted that grape pickers, "among the poorest working people in our land of plenty," are locked in a "desperate struggle" to secure collective bargaining agreements.

Federal Plan For Day Care Centers Urged

The Clothing Workers called for intensive federal involvement in the development and operation of a nationwide system of day care centers for children of working mothers.

Vice Pres. Sam Nocella of ACWA cited the need for the federally-supported day care centers in testimony before a House Education subcommittee. He testified in favor of a bill that would provide for comprehensive pre-school education programs.

Nocella said that the ACWA, which is a pioneer in developing union-employe day care centers, has estimated it would cost at least $8 billion to construct and $5.2 billion annually to operate day care centers for the 4 million pre-school children of America's working mothers.

"Due to the size of the problem, the federal government should begin to participate heavily, with full knowledge of costs to be incurred, but with full knowledge also of the immediate and ultimate benefits to be attained," Nocella said.

He noted that the centers benefit children by giving them a wholesome educational environment, mothers by relieving them of anxiety and expense, and employers by cutting down on worker absenteeism and tardiness.

Christmas 1969

ON THIS CHRISTMAS of 1969 the struggle continues to establish peace and freedom on a lasting basis—a struggle that has continued without let-up since the end of World War II.

It is as clear now as it was in 1945 that there is no alternative to peace in this age of missiles and satellites; peace today is a condition of survival.

The free world has the resources, the manpower and the ability to rid the world of hunger and disease and to provide the basis of social justice so that all men can taste of bread and freedom.

THE HOLIDAY PERIOD this year is a time for summing up as well the history of the decade, the years that started out as the Soaring Sixties and ground down in the final years to a bewildered series of questions all adding up to "what next?"

The magazines, the year-end editions, the broadcast media are all coming up with their summations, interpretations and analyses and they tend to be brittle and shrill with a heavy emphasis on miniskirts and morality and drugs and violence and assassinations and little if anything on what was happening to ordinary people, to workers and their families.

In the December 1969 issue of the Federationist, we too take a look at the decade, one we chose to call "A Vibrant Decade." And an AFL-CIO staff member who has lived that decade in the trade union movement, David Perlman, writes that "for those in the labor movement who have been involved in the struggles, triumphs and tragedies, this has been a momentous era—more kin to the 1930s, certainly, than to the apathy of the 1950s."

The Federationist article notes that an editorial in this space on Dec. 26, 1959, commented that "the dominant mood of the nation seems to be one of self-satisfaction and a calm fatalism that things will work out for the best in this best of all possible worlds." It warned that this mood could not cope with the challenges of the Sixties.

Reviewing the accomplishments, the landmarks of the 1960s, Perlman writes that in contrast to the 1950s, at the end of this decade in American life the "nation as a whole is aware of its serious and urgent problems." He continues:

"We know we cannot dump more tons of pollution into the air and water and survive for long. We know that people must have decent housing, adequate transportation, safe neighborhoods and jobs at living wages. We know that it is possible, through government action, to avoid the cycle of boom and bust and to provide for economic growth.

"And we know that new groups of workers, once considered unorganizable, can and will use the trade union movement as their ladder to a better life."

There is no calm self-satisfaction as the Sixties draw to a close and the Seventies come on stage. There is a recognition of problems and challenges, many of them severe and critical. And in the trade union movement there is a cautious, quiet confidence that the nation and organized labor will prevail. They always have.

'Bah! Humbug!'

A Word Edgewise:

Democrats Shaken by Impact Of Liberal Catastrophe Politics

By John P. Roche

THE POOR OLD Democratic Party is in worse shape today than it has been in some time—since perhaps 1956. When the Republicans have problems—as they did in 1964—there is always a good simple remedy. But the Democrats, alas, are not so easily doctored: too many of their troubles are, as my father would have put it, "in the head." The GOP can go out and get a few stitches—the Democrats need a psychiatrist.

Take the cross pressures at work on, say, Hubert Humphrey, or Ed Muskie, or Fred Harris. A tremendously articulate constituency is at work on them day and night telling them that unless the party makes Viet Nam the issue, and comes out for instant withdrawal, the Democrats are through.

These are mostly fine sincere people. Though the Communist Party and other sects have undoubtedly played an important organizational role in the anti-war movement, the great majority of the protestors are there on their own. (Unfortunately, the Attorney General does not seem to understand that these two propositions are not inconsistent.)

I admit that I am fundamentally baffled by the wildly irrational response to Viet Nam in intellectual circles, but there it is. So we have a situation where leading academic and cultural figures—who will always get press and media coverage — are socking it to Humphrey, Muskie, Harris, et al.

And they can not be dismissed automatically as "commies," "dupes," or just fanatics. Many of them have worked hard and loyally in past campaigns. And, I repeat (despite the fact that some of the scars on my back ache) they are fundamentally decent people, driven by a deep concern for American national interest as they see it.

I, for example, spent 21 years as a member of Americans for Democratic Action—three years as national chairman. Throughout that period ADA was the nesting place of Cold War liberals, a designation that I am proud to accept though it has recently become a term of abuse. Hubert Humphrey is also a former national chairman of ADA and—even though we left the organization—many personal ties and warm memories of past campaigns remain.

But, even making personal allowances, what can one make of an ADA decision to oppose Senate Resolution 280? The key section of the resolution reads that the Senate "affirms its support for the President in his efforts to negotiate a just peace in Viet Nam, expresses the earnest hope of the [American] people . . . for such a peace . . . approves and supports the principles . . . that the people of South Viet Nam are entitled to choose their own government by means of free elections . . . and that the United States is willing to abide by the results of such elections and requests the President to call upon [Hanoi] to join in a proclamation of a mutual cease fire and to announce its willingness to honor such elections and abide with the results. . . ."

REGRETTABLY, opposition to this resolution can only be founded on one premise: ADA has a vested interest in an American catastrophe in Viet Nam. Having predicted a disaster so long and stridently (National Chairman John K. Galbraith, for example, announced shortly after the Tet offensive in 1968 that the Saigon government would collapse in two weeks), ADA has reached the point of no return.

But what sense can this position make to a liberal politician? In immediate terms, he knows that if things go well in Viet Nam, Nixon wins—and if they go badly, the liberals (who got us there) lose.

In broader terms, however, the impact of liberal catastrophe politics would be a long-run disaster — if the American people ever get it through their heads that liberal Democrats are rooting for an American defeat in Southeast Asia, we will be through politically for the rest of the century.

Humphrey, of course, knows this—it helps to account for his occasionally schizophrenic political behavior. As chief psychiatrist of the Democratic Party—a fearful job—he deserves considerably more sympathy and understanding than he has received.

Sen. Mondale Says:

Punitive Attack on Unions Keyed to Total Distortion

The U.S. Senate, by a vote of 59 to 27, rejected an amendment to the omnibus tax bill offered by Sen. Paul J. Fannin (R-Ariz.) which would have driven organized labor out of politics. Sen. Walter Mondale (D-Minn.) headed the fight against it. This article is based on excerpts from his remarks.

THE FANNIN AMENDMENT is an unfair, one-sided, anti-labor amendment, designed not only to prevent citizens from contributing to a political campaign, but from even speaking up and asserting their rights under the First Amendment.

It does many other things. The League of Women Voters, for example, is a tax-exempt organization. In recent years, it has undertaken many exciting efforts to try to broaden voter participation in our country. . . .

One wonders why the great fear, why the great apprehension which leads to these efforts to discourage the League of Women Voters and the foundations from encouraging nonvoters to register and exercise their franchise.

This same kind of fear of people voting is seen in many states where registration laws are deliberately set up to block a working man from registering to vote during working hours. Voting registration is set up to coincide with working hours. And a man who is working an eight-hour shift cannot register to vote.

The professional man, however, can easily get off a few hours to vote. And his wife can easily take their second car and go to register.

In some states we have registration each year. And the lists are purged. That makes it exceedingly difficult for the average uninformed working person to even know of the complicated restrictions that make invalid, unknowingly, his capacity to even participate.

Some states, for example, hold registration during a period when they know that thousands and thousands of their people are out of state as migrant laborers. This is done because they know these people will be unable to register and participate in their elections.

This is done even though the migrant workers are in the majority in those counties.

This amendment is an unparalleled, unprecedented effort to interfere with the right of tax-exempt organizations to express themselves pursuant to the guarantees of the First Amendment of the Constitution.

Moreover, it would place the power to drop the guillotine blade on any of these organizations at the discretion of the tax commissioner. He would first decide who had violated this broad rule and who had not. . . .

The fact that unions were being singled out for punitive treatment and denied a right that would remain to the other organizations has been totally distorted. . . .

The tax-exempt status of labor unions, and the political activities they may undertake, is identical to that of all the other tax-exempt organizations. To claim that unions enjoy a special privilege in the law is a clear misrepresentation of the facts. . . .

Lest anyone believe that unions are totally uninhibited in their political activities, it must be made clear that they do not have total freedom to engage in political activities as they might see fit. The tax code is not the only law regulating unions. There are many restrictions on unions in the Taft-Hartley Act, in the Landrum-Griffin Act and, most directly applicable here, the Federal Corrupt Practices Act. . . .

Let me point out that business corporations are presently able to obtain a tax deduction for a wide range of political and legislative activities. No similar benefit is enjoyed by the working man, the consumer, or the small taxpayer. . . .

What would loss of tax exemption mean to labor organizations?

THE EFFECT of such a loss is not clear. It would appear, however, that such a loss would have a devastating effect on labor unions, almost alone among the tax-exempt groups I have noted, for unions are multipurpose organizations that are required to accumulate money for fraternal benefits, strike benefits, and so forth. Most other tax-exempt organizations are in a position in which they could minimize the impact of a loss of tax exemption by spending all of their income each year. . .

Is it my understanding that the National Right to Work Committee . . . would be able to continue its activities—and no one can doubt that their activities are political—without endangering their tax-exempt status to any degree.

Moreover, this tax-exemption loss on labor unions would occur only in the event that unions continued to exercise what have been recognized as their constitutional rights of free speech and association. A prudent union leader would have grave difficulty approving acts which might jeopardize his union treasury until we have ascertained the impact of this vague amendment on his organization. . . .

The right of unions to solicit voluntary contributions and the right of individual workingmen to contribute is essential to a balanced political system. In the last election for which we have authoritative figures, the 1956 election, 12 families and the officers of the 225 largest corporations made contributions of $500 or more each, that totaled $3 million.

Union officials contributed $19,000. Naturally, union members individually do not have the resources to make such contributions, but together they pooled their funds to make contributions of $1 million—one-third of the total of the wealthy individuals mentioned above.

Fundamental fairness supports the opportunity of millions of working men and women to counter the effectiveness of the small group of wealthy citizens who can afford highly visible and memorable large contributions.

The right of unions to engage in non-partisan voter registration directed at their members is also essential to maintain a balance between labor and the industrial community.

BOTH THE Nixon Administration and the Federal Reserve Board have been assuring us for the past months that they know how to lick inflation.

High interest rates, a tightening of the money supply, budgetary cutbacks, a general tightening of belts—all these were supposed to stop the rising cost of living, stabilize the dollar and generally show what good conservative economics could accomplish.

It hasn't worked out that way.

In fact, economists both inside and outside of the Administration are having a terrible time squaring their economic theories with the realities of what is happening.

There are signs that the economy is slowing down. Workers know that. Overtime which had become an important source of income has been dropping steadily.

Housing has been cruelly hit by high interest rates and the scarcity of mortgage money—so much so that HUD Sec. George Romney has painted a gloomy picture of the steadily deteriorating housing picture in relation to its needs.

Unemployment shot up to 4 percent in September, dropped slightly in October and fell further to 3.4 percent in November. Interpretations of this vary. Apparently many young people and women dropped out of the labor market because of job scarcity.

Interest rates while still at record highs, have shown a slight tendency to drop, although not enough to make much of a dent in the aggravating tight money situation.

Yet, in the face of all this, the cost of living is still rising. The Consumers Price Index hit a record high of 129.8 during the month of October and gave no signs of any dramatic drop for the rest of the year.

To confuse the economic situation still further, top corporations are planning to increase their investment in plant and equipment during the first six months of 1970 by about 11 percent, even though Nixon Administration economists were confident that the increase would be no more than 6 or 7 percent.

HIGH PROFITS and access to the lowest interest rates available are largely responsible for this ability of huge corporations to fly in the face of government—especially Republican government policy.

As a result of these paradoxical developments, a steady but obviously rising doubt, has been arising as to whether the Nixon Administration is on the right road to accomplish what it has made its first priority—an end to inflation without wrecking the economy.

Wall Street is in the doldrums with an overall loss of values of huge and, in some stocks, catastrophic proportions. Market analysts are uncertain as to why stocks are down as much as they are except to speculate that buyers are bewildered.

A further commentary on the state of uncertainty is that two members of the Federal Reserve Board are now having their doubts about the efficacy of tight money as a potent cure-all for inflation. As long ago as three months, members George W. Mitchell and Sherman J. Maisel urged a relaxation of severely restrictive policies.

Administration economists insist that they can lick inflation without boosting unemployment to unacceptable heights—with the adjective "unacceptable" meaning different rates to different people. Other economists insist equally that a recession may well be ahead with unemployment going to 6 and 7 percent.

Sec. of Commerce Maurice E. Stans, in contrast with the soothing words of some Administration spokesmen, has said that the country faces "bad, bitter medicine," before it can grow solidly again.

On top of that Pres. Nixon himself has threatened to veto both the tax reform bill and social security improvements that already are in the congressional mill.

Bewilderment, uncertainty, doubts, pessimism—these are the reactions to today's economy. Clearly when all the available facts are added up, a less stubborn clinging to conventional economics is in order.

Merchants Cooperate:

Burdens of GE Strikers Eased By Special Assistance Efforts

ORGANIZED LABOR is mobilizing voluntary and public agency resources to help ease family burdens resulting from the General Electric strike.

Dir. Leo Perlis, of the AFL-CIO Community Services, said surplus food and food stamps are two of many aids available to the striking workers and their families. The strikers should know, he said, that they have a right to this kind of help since the "sole criterion is need."

"As long as a person meets the eligibility requirements" for various programs, he is entitled to help from them, "regardless of the cause" of his need, Perlis stressed.

He appeared on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Perlis said that national and local community services representatives are also working with merchants, landlords, banks and other financial and lending institutions to "ease the economic pressures on the strikers." He said that in most cases, local merchants and others are "quite willing" to extend credit, delay debt payments and otherwise cooperate with the strikers in their time of special need.

"THEY KNOW THEM as neighbors . . . and citizens" in the community, he noted. He also pointed out that the merchants also know the strikers as customers and consumers who "pay their bills when they have the money," so "they don't push them—they don't press them too hard." He said that "generally, across the country, we have a pretty friendly atmosphere."

Reporters questioning Perlis were Sam Sharkey, of the Newhouse Newspapers and Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press.

MOBILIZING VOLUNTARY and public agency help for families is a key part of the AFL-CIO's efforts to ease the burdens of 150,000 workers now in the eighth week of their strike against General Electric, Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis, center, said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him on the interview program, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on Mutual radio, were Sam Sharkey, left, of the Newhouse Newspapers and Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press.

How to Buy:

Family Food Costs Escalated By Government Farm Policies

By Sidney Margolius

YOUR FOOD could cost a little less if the government stopped supporting farm prices by buying up so-called "surplus" commodities to help the farmers.

The commodity-purchase and other government price support programs especially hurt moderate income families now that the price of milk has taken another jump this winter. Milk now costs 30-35 cents a quart in most areas. A family with two children that hopes to use the nutritionally-recommended 21 quarts a week finds its milk bill alone is in the neighborhood of $7 a week.

It's impossible, of course, to pay this much out of a total food budget of $38 a week that a family of this size might spend for a moderate-cost food plan. (In fact, $38 a week for food itself is impossible for the average industrial worker currently earning $117 a week.)

Some farmers do need financial assistance all right. But the government spends $3 billion a year buying commodities and the public then pays additional untold billions in the form of higher prices, Meyer Parodneck, president of the Consumer-Farmer Milk Cooperative, points out.

Some part of those billions are your money too. You pay in the form of taxes to take the commodities off the market, and then in higher prices for the price-supported foods.

Instead of buying up commodities to keep up prices, direct subsidies would cost the government only about half as much, Parodneck, a long-time co-op milk distributor points out. The government would save the extra costs imposed on "surplus" commodities by brokers, warehouses, processors and others in the daisy chain of food distribution. Much of the money the government spends to supposedly help the farmers goes to these people.

The government's support of the price of butter is one of the reasons why the price of milk is high. "But when the consumer seeks to escape this trap by buying 'filled milk' (milk from which the butterfat has been extracted and vegetable fat substituted) the Agriculture Dept. then classifies this product as Class I milk carrying the same price as fluid milk," Parodneck points out.

Some of the butter bought up and stored to keep up the price of milk even then is wasted. In fact, some "surplus" butter which turned rancid in past years has been sold for use as axle grease, Parodneck reports.

Another way that the price of milk you buy is forced up, is through the double-price system used in the milk marketing orders. These orders regulate the price the farmer receives. Milk sold for use as drinking milk, called Class I milk, is sold at a higher price than Class II milk sold for manufacturing into dairy products such as cheese and ice cream.

The theory behind this double-price system is that the milk for manufacturing purposes is "surplus" or leftover milk. For example, farmers currently are paid 15 cents a quart for milk to be sold as "drinking" milk, but only 10 cents for "manufacturing" milk, even though both are the same milk.

Ironically, when the high price of "drinking" milk forces families to reduce their use of it, the dairy-products manufacturers benefit since there then is more "surplus" milk they can buy at a low price.

THE WAY MILK is priced is obsolete and cost-raising in another way. The recent White House Conference on Food, Nutrition & Health recommended that milk be priced on the basis of its nonfat solids rather than its butterfat content.

But also, milk prices need to be reduced by eliminating barriers such as artificial local "sanitary regulations" impeding the flow of milk from Midwest dairy states to large population centers; through economies in retail distribution; through encouragement of competition and active surveillance and prosecution of local milk price fixing, and through encouragement of low-cost milk stations such as those sponsored by the Consumer-Farmer Milk Co-op in New York City in conjunction with settlement houses in low-income neighborhoods.

What can you do to protect yourself, especially if you live in one of the higher-cost milk cities? It is noticeable that even in the same region milk costs a lot more in some towns than in others nearby.

For one thing, don't try to boycott milk as one inquirer asked whether we should. If not as reasonable as it could be, it still is a reasonable food compared to many others. A quart of milk is 2.2 pounds. So figure it costs you 13-14 cents a pound.

If you can't afford to buy all the fluid milk your family needs, then use non-fat milk powder to make reconstituted milk at 11-12 cents a quart, and mix this with fresh milk. Also use the non-fat milk powder in cooking and baking to add nutrition to desserts, soups, meat patties and loaves, etc.

Soup to Nonsense:

...For the Meek Shall Inherit Misconceived Fortune Cookies

By Jane Goodsell

IF YOU ARE the type of person.

Who can't look a policeman in the eye because you owe 48 cents in unpaid library fines. . . .

Who knows before you get to the party that you're going to be dressed wrong even though you've telephoned four other guests to find out what they're wearing. . . .

Who always buys raffle tickets because you don't want people to think you're a cheapskate, but who throws them away before the drawing because you know you're not the sort of person who ever wins anything. . . .

Who always overtips waiters, even those who bring you beef stroganoff when you ordered stuffed pork chops. . . .

Who feels apologetic toward people who don't remember that they've been introduced to you on four previous occasions. . . .

Who takes for granted that the people holding green tickets who are lined up at the blue ticket window must know something that you don't know. . . .

Who assumes that if you get the answer before anyone else, you must have misunderstood the question. . . .

Who eats Crab Louis even though you know it will make you break out in hives because you don't want to embarrass your hostess. . . .

Who keeps gifts you don't want because you know that if you return it to the store, you'll run into the person who gave it to you at the exchange desk. . . .

WHO IS AFRAID to change jobs because any prospective employer who checked up on you would find out that you once got a ticket for jaywalking. . . .

Who assumes that the blue Pontiac which the voice on the loudspeaker announces is illegally parked and blocking traffic must be yours, even though you drive a green Chevrolet. . . .

Who (if you are a woman) goes through life worrying that your slip is showing; and (if you are a man) that your fly is open. . . .

Then you had best assume that a fortune cookie advising you against over-confidence was probably meant for somebody else.

MINORITY YOUTHS in Birmingham, Ala., will be prepared for building trades apprenticeship programs under a one-year, $51,600 Apprenticeship Outreach contract received by the Birmingham Building & Construction Trades Council. Murphy of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training, which granted the contract; and Business Manager William T. Thrash of the Birmingham council.

Index Skids:

Consumer Sentiment Reflects Pessimism

CONSUMER ATTITUDES, continuing to deteriorate for the third successive quarter, are now measured at close to the low point reached prior to the 1957-58 recession, according to the University of Michigan Survey Research Center.

Barring good news in such areas as inflation, unemployment, the war in Viet Nam, or tax relief, the UM economists predict a decline in consumer demand for cars and other durables, leisure-time pursuits, and other optional goods and services.

The findings, based on personal interviews with a national cross-section of nearly 1,500 families, were compiled by the quarterly survey directors.

The SRC Index of Consumer Sentiment fell to 79.7 in the fourth quarter of 1969. This was an unusually sharp drop from the 95.1 recorded in February 1969, at which time the index reached its highest point during the last two years. (The base level of 100 reflects conditions as of February 1966.)

The simplest explanation for consumers' present pessimistic notions, the economists suggest, is that they expect the fight against inflation to be successful, that the pace of price increases will slow down, and that some increase in unemployment will take place.

The proportion expecting unemployment to rise during the next 12 months reached 52 percent in October-November, as against 20 percent a year ago. The proportion saying that a recession is likely rose to 40 percent from 26 percent a year ago. A growing number are pessimistic about business conditions during the coming year, the strongest single factor in the index decline of the last three months.

According to earlier surveys, consumer reaction to inflation was the most important factor contributing to declining sentiment between February and August-September 1969. By November, however, a somewhat smaller proportion of people expected large price increases.

ATTITUDES REFLECT consumers' willingness to buy, the report continues, which in turn indicates the direction of forthcoming trends in discretionary spending. But measurements of willingness to buy must be used in conjunction with information concerning consumers' ability to buy. Commerce Dept. data show that aggregate incomes continue at a high level; yet the steady growth in real incomes during the previous years has given way to a sideways movement.

Even though a sizable proportion of past and expected income increases has been or will be wiped out by price increases, UM economists say, the trend in ability to buy remains much more favorable than the trend in willingness to buy.

The report concludes:

"Consumer demand for durables, leisure-time pursuits, and other optional goods and services will decline. The indications are not just for a sideways movement interrupting the past upward trend, but for a decline in real terms. Demand for one-family houses, already weak, may decline further."

"If prices should rise noticeably slower than in the recent past, without a substantial increase in unemployment, the impending declines might be relatively small. Should events unfold the other way, with continuous price increases having a substantial impact on consumer attitudes at a time when the threat of unemployment and recession looms larger, the outlook for the consumer sector would worsen further.

Voting Rights, Anti-Poverty Rollcalls

Voting rights and the anti-poverty program were the issues.

Column 1 shows the 208-203 vote on Dec. 11 by which the House scuttled a bill to extend the 1965 Voting Rights Act and substituted a weak Administration proposal.

On labor's scoreboard, 154 Democrats and 49 Republicans cast Right votes (R) against the substitute; 129 Republicans and 79 Democrats cast Wrong votes (W) to scrap the Voting Rights Act.

Column 2 shows the 231-163 vote on Dec. 12 upholding the federal anti-poverty program and rejecting an attempt to turn the program over to the states.

The scoreboard shows 168 Democrats and 63 Republicans casting Right votes for the federal program; 103 Republicans and 60 Democrats cast Wrong votes for state control.

Labor's Battle for Tax Reform, Justice

THE NEARLY YEAR-LONG struggle in Congress to revamp the Federal income tax law draws to a close with every likelihood that new rules affecting every American's pocketbook will become law with the beginning of the new year.

The verdict as to whether a degree of tax justice has been achieved or if the new law is a cruel hoax will come in the House-Senate conference measure. But the story can be told now of the months of struggle between those who sought genuine reform and those forces seeking to counter any rewriting of the law. Retracing the year's events provides the background to understand what has evolved thus far and what will probably emerge as law.

Early in 1969, the rumbles of a "taxpayer's revolt" and a four-volume report by the outgoing Democratic Treasury Dept. detailing widespread tax avoidance set the stage for an in-depth examination of the federal income tax law.

Tax reform hearings opened Feb. 18 before the House Ways & Means Committee in an atmosphere of public outrage at revelations that many millionaires totally escaped payment of federal income taxes and other high income citizens paid taxes at rates not much higher than families of low and moderate means.

The AFL-CIO played a major role in arousing public awareness of the issues involved and their dollars-and-cents impact on workers' paychecks. It mounted a massive educational campaign among wage earners, distributing millions of pamphlets and leaflets keyed to the theme of tax justice.

Against this background of testimony, the AFL-CIO proposed to the Congress a comprehensive program of tax reform. This program would close major loopholes and raise $16 billion in new revenues, from which would come funds sufficient for $9 billion in federal programs and $7 billion in tax relief for low and moderate income families.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the committee that America's union members paid their taxes regularly and were "willing to pay their fair share" but they were tired of paying the share of other Americans whose incomes were greater and whose taxes were lower.

The AFL-CIO was among more than 300 witnesses to appear before the committee, but it was part of a slim minority. Most witnesses pleaded for retention of a tax privilege or sought expansion of one being enjoyed. Those witnesses who sought tax reform were fewer than a dozen, primarily former federal agency officials, university professors and church, labor and consumer spokesmen.

After the parade of public witnesses had ended, the new-in-office Nixon Administration offered its proposals for reform: $4.3 billion in new revenue and $665 million in tax relief, the latter being a low income allowance that would phase out dollar for dollar as a family's income exceeded the poverty level.

With these yards of testimony in hand, the Ways & Means Committee retired into closed-door sessions on Apr. 28 and remained for eight weeks. During that period the corridors outside the conference room were choked with lobbyists representing oil, coal, limestone, race horses, real estate, stock brokers, and every conceivable type of trade or business association.

The committee's deliberations, however, were to face more than lobbyist pressures. The 10 percent income tax surcharge enacted in 1968 was due to expire on June 30 unless it was extended. Early in April Pres. Nixon had asked that the tax be continued, to which the AFL-CIO Executive Council responded that it would "not support any extension of the surtax until it is combined with immediate, substantial and equitable reform of the federal income tax structure."

AS THE SURTAX expiration date drew near and pressure from the Nixon Administration intensified, the Ways & Means Committee, still meeting behind closed doors, reported out a separate bill that would extend the 10 percent surtax, repeal the 7 percent investment tax credit for industry and remove from the tax rolls all families whose incomes were below the poverty level.

The AFL-CIO quickly rejected the measure as merely continuing an inequitable tax on top of regular taxes while doing nothing about the loopholes that protect those whose incomes derive from oil, investments, real estate and other tax avoidances. Inclusion of the other two provisions, the AFL-CIO charged, would only make genuine tax reform harder to achieve.

When the bill came to the House floor, it ran into a hornet's nest of opposition, despite strong pressure for passage from both Republican and Democratic House leadership and the White House. In the final showdown, the measure squeaked through by a 210 to 205 vote, but only after Congress had extracted a public pledge from the President and congressional leaders that a strong reform bill would be acted upon shortly.

Soon thereafter, when the Senate Finance Committee held hearings on the House-passed surtax measure, the AFL-CIO appeared as a witness to make clear its total opposition to the measure and to insist on comprehensive tax reform legislation instead.

Later, when Senate Democratic Leader Mike Mansfield received assurance from Finance Committee Chairman Russell Long that his committee would hold hearings and complete its work on the tax bill by Oct. 31, a six months extension of the surtax was approved. However, the provisions affecting the 7 percent investment tax credit and the low income allowance were held back and returned to the tax reform package.

Thus pressure was established in the Senate to assure that a tax reform bill would be out of the Finance Committee in time for action during the current session of Congress. Meanwhile, the House Ways & Means Committee ended its seclusion and reported out the long-awaited tax reform bill.

The AFL-CIO upon examining the bill declared it to be a "major step down the road toward tax justice," but warned that it still didn't go far enough.

IN REFORM PROVISIONS, the bill would produce $7 billion, about half of which would come from narrowing existing loopholes. The remainder, $3.3 billion, would come from repeal of the 7 percent investment tax credit.

In tax relief, the bill that reached the House floor differed from that which the committee reported in one major respect. It provided an additional $2.4 billion in relief to cover a gaping hole in the tax relief provisions. Later termed a "misunderstanding" between the Treasury Dept. and the committee, the omission would have denied any tax relief whatsoever to those families with incomes in the $7,000 to $13,000 income range who itemize their income tax deductions. The AFL-CIO, which spotted the omission in the bill, took its findings to liberal House Democrats who initiated a crash campaign to restyle the bill's tax rate reductions so that relief would go primarily to those in low and moderate income tax brackets.

A bill to achieve this end was prepared by Rep. Richard Bolling to be offered to the Rules Committee as the sole allowable amendment to the bill on the House floor.

At this point Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur Mills agreed to incorporate an amendment similar to Bollings' proposal into the bill. However, the earlier heavy rate cuts for high income taxpayers also remained in the bill. With this revision, the bill was adopted, 394-30, and sent to the Senate Finance Committee.

Once more the AFL-CIO found itself before the Senate Finance Committee. This time it offered a tax reform blueprint tailored to go beyond the steps taken in the House-passed measure. In his testimony, Meany called for $16 billion in loophole-closing tax provisions to provide funds for needed social programs and tax relief that would have its greatest impact among low and moderate income families.

The AFL-CIO proposed that the $1,100 low income allowance and the 15 percent-$2,000 standard deduction be coupled with a reduction in the lowest five tax percentage brackets. The result would be to make tax savings more equitable to everyone, regardless of income.

Meany pointed out that under the House-passed provision a married individual whose taxable income is $100,000 would receive a $3,600 tax cut while the $8,000 married individual would have his taxes cut only $80. Under the AFL-CIO proposal both would receive a tax cut of $130.

DOING LITTLE to cheer the pro reform spectators was the testimony offered by the Nixon Administration. Treasury Sec. David Kennedy told an astonished committee that the administration recommended cutting $2.5 billion from the tax relief for the poor in the House bill. He recommended that the $2.5 billion be given to corporations in the form of a 2 percent corporate tax rate cut.

After a month of testimony that was a virtual rerun of the House hearings, the Senate committee went into closed-door sessions. During their consideration of tax relief, the AFL-CIO proposal for tax cuts in the five lowest tax brackets was offered by Sen. Vance Hartke but was defeated by a 10-7 vote. A proposal by Sen. Albert Gore to increase the personal exemption to $850 was defeated in committee on an 8 to 8 vote, after which Gore promised to make a fight on the floor.

At this point the AFL-CIO was faced with a decision. If no change in the tax rate was made on the Senate floor, both the House and Senate bills would contain the identical unfair rate cut provisions and thus would be untouchable by House-Senate conferees.

While the AFL-CIO rate cut proposal was clearly the fairest of the three for low and moderate income families, the personal exemption increase was more popular. If a fight came on the floor between the two, both would be doomed. Thus the AFL-CIO decided that if the personal exemption proposal by Gore were coupled with a low income allowance, it would be far superior to what was in the bill and, in the long run, would not be any more costly.

Thus, when Gore offered on the Senate floor his proposal to increase the personal exemption to $800 and coupled it with a low income allowance of $1,000, the AFL-CIO gave it strong support. The Gore amendment was subsequently adopted, 48-32.

The bill that was eventually reported out of the Finance Committee on Oct. 31—the exact deadline promised by Long to Mansfield—was generally similar to the House bill in the total amount of funds it would realize ($7 billion) and the amount that it would pay out in relief ($8.5 billion). In closed door sessions scores of amendments had been considered and rejected (including Sen. Fannin's amendment to strip unions of their political rights). Several modifications of House-passed provisions were adopted as well as several exemptions for specific corporations, either as cushions for the upcoming taxes or as total escape from the full impact. Among those who received specific tax favors were railroads, coal mines, oil, oil shale, copper, gold, molybdenum, Mobil Oil, Uniroyal, Lockheed Aircraft, Litton Industries, Transamerica Corp., Federal Cartridge Corp. and various foundations.

Special interest business lobbyists descended on the Finance Committee "like a plague of locusts," AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller observed.

But still more was to come on the Senate floor. The bill came up for Senate action on Nov. 24, and under the rules of the Senate it was open to amendment at any point. In rapid order amendments came that would expand the loophole provisions and lessen the revenue gaining provision in the bill. A so-called "small business" exemption took $720 million out of the bill; a relaxing of the real estate tax shelter cost another $100 million; a variety of other provisions inserted into the bill would cost the treasury heavily, including a $1.6 billion provision for educational tax credits.

MEANWHILE, a group of senators who had worked informally with the AFL-CIO to seek reform introduced amendments that would have further closed loopholes. But in each case they were unable to muster a winning margin. Sen. Lee Metcalf's amendment to curb tax dodge farming would have raised $210 million; Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's amendment to establish a meaningful minimum tax would have raised an additional $420 million; Sen. Joseph Tydings's proposal to tax capital gains at death would have brought in an additional $2.2 billion. All received strong support from the AFL-CIO as did other proposed amendments affecting financial institutions and the allocation of deductions.

The bill as it was finally adopted and reported to conference on Dec. 11 is more than 500 pages long and represents the most massive overhauling of the tax code in the history of the nation. Since February it has consumed the time and talents of more than 100 government tax experts, lawyers and economists day and night, weekdays, weekends and holidays. The Senate version would cost about $10 billion annually and realize $5.6 billion in new revenue, when fully effective.

It was the most heavily lobbied bill in history. Congressional Quarterly reported that 40 individuals and firms registered specifically to lobby on the bill. These are in addition to the scores of already registered lobbyists who were active in behalf of some portions of the bill.

But the loneliest of all in the crowd were those few who followed the tax bill from its spawning to its conclusion—always in pursuit of tax justice, but always reminded of the statement made by a tax-writing congressman when the first hearing opened. Holding up a copy of the Internal Revenue Code, he stated that the law was 1,000 pages long, but only 100 pages was the basic law, the other 900 pages were the exceptions that had been written in.

What emerges from the House-Senate conference will tell the story of whether the basic law will be equitably expanded beyond those 100 pages or whether there will be still more pages of special loophole exceptions in America's income tax law.

Approximate net revenue gain		$8,130-10,330

At Studies Center Graduation:

State Labor's Role Stressed by Meany

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the first graduating class of the federation's Labor Studies Center that they represented a historic new phase in the development of organized labor in America.

The graduates of the center's initial course, all officers and staff members of state central labor bodies, have just completed a five-day institute. They heard experts from government, labor and education discuss critical problems in state government.

Meany called it "entirely appropriate" that the first class should come from the state organizations "where labor wins its big fights."

"You can't overestimate the importance of the state and local AFL-CIO organizations," Meany said. He stressed, as an example, that it is at the state level that labor's political action must function most effectively.

Speaking of the vastly expanded role played by labor in today's society, Meany noted that in the past the function of the trade union movement was "relatively simple." But today the traditional tasks of organizing and improving the situation on the job are only part of the story, he noted.

Labor's increased importance as the "voice" of the people in the legislative halls brings additional responsibilities, he said. And this means that today's labor leader must have far-ranging expertise—from politics to health care—consumer affairs, civil rights and retirement.

"That last problem we can attribute to the success of the movement," Meany said. "Twenty-five or 30 years ago nobody 'retired.' He just faded away or became an object of somebody's charity. Now labor must be expert on pensions and try to make some contribution to the individual's life after he retires."

Rooted in Education

The Labor Studies Center was established by the AFL-CIO in the recognition that union officials must be involved in helping to solve the economic, social and political problems of the nation. "The tools and knowledge for providing this leadership are rooted in education," the federation's Executive Council said as it authorized the new center in February 1969.

The center's board of trustees, under the chairmanship of Meany, and its staff have put together programs that will continue through June 1970. The first term's courses emphasize staff training while later sessions will expand to other areas such as civil rights, environmental problems and proposed solutions to them, and labor law.

The center's second program, a collective bargaining seminar for East Coast Federal Metal Trades Councils, just concluded with AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Hunter P. Wharton, president of the Operating Engineers, presenting the diplomas.

Next on the agenda is a three-week long staff development program to begin Jan. 4.

5 Rail Unions Draft Plans for New Congress

Five railroad unions that previously withdrew from the Railway Labor Executives' Association have announced they will form a new Congress of Railway Unions shortly after Jan. 1.

The announcement was made by Presidents C. L. Dennis, Railway & Airline Clerks; Charles Luna, United Transportation Union; Paul Hall, Seafarers, and Harold Crotty, Maintenance of Way Employes; and Richard Smith, who heads the Dining Car Employes division of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes.

It was announced that Luna has been chosen as chairman of the new Congress and Donald S. Beattie as executive secretary. Dennis will serve as chairman of the Congress' railroad retirement committee.

In another development, the 13 unions remaining affiliated with the RLEA announced that J. Taylor Soop of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers has been named executive secretary of the association.

Soop succeeds Beattie, who left the RLEA when the union in which he holds membership, UTU, withdrew. RLEA also announced that Pres. William E. Fredenberger of the Firemen & Oilers has been named chairman of its retirement committee.

Musicians' 'Ham' Radio Links GIs With Families

Mansfield, Ohio—Christmas messages and seasons greetings from American GIs all over the globe will be routed through a permanent "ham" radio station set up here by the Musicians union.

The Musicians have installed a "phone patch" which connects the station with the telephone system, allowing the servicemen overseas to talk with their families at home.

The union will pay for the telephone calls on Christmas Day between the station and servicemen's homes anywhere in the United States. The messages are transmitted from the overseas points by the Military Amateur Radio Service (MARS).

A similar program was offered last Christmas by the AFM on a temporary basis through Mansfield Local 159. The program was met so enthusiastically, that the union expanded the facilities and financed the purchase of new equipment for the station in time for use by this holiday season.

Pres. Robert Altomonte of the Mansfield local, an amateur radio operator, was responsible for setting up the Christmas calls last year and promoted the permanent radio set up.

Altomonte will be on 24-hour duty Christmas day to facilitate as many calls as possible over the Musicians' station K8QAX.

While the primary objective of the station is to handle the traffic between military personnel and their families, it will also be used to assist national and local agencies during emergencies.

Pres. Herman Kenin of the Musicians, who announced the station's expanded and permanent facilities, expressed pleasure that the 300,000-member union is "contributing to the Christmas joy of so many Americans serving overseas."

HUMAN RIGHTS AWARD of the Jewish Labor Committee's National Trade Union Council is bestowed on Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., center, of the New York City AFL-CIO by Federation Pres. George Meany. JLC Pres. Charles Zimmerman, a vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, is at the left.

Human Rights Award Given Van Arsdale

New York—Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City AFL-CIO was presented the third annual Labor Human Rights Award of the Jewish Labor Committee's National Trade Union Council.

At a crowded dinner chaired by JLC Pres. Charles Zimmerman, Van Arsdale drew the praise of a notable roster of speakers headed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

Describing Van Arsdale as "an old friend," Meany credited him with doing "more than any other man in this city" to combat poverty through his role in organizing "thousands of taxi drivers, hospital workers and municipal employes."

Taking the opportunity to speak on the General Electric strike, Meany said:

"You all know about GE's "take-it-or-leave-it" bargaining. We decided not to take it. And our support of these striking unions is without precedent in the AFL and the CIO. It is now a strike of the entire labor movement. We are raising funds in every community and we have picket lines from coast to coast.

"If GE wins this strike, it will lick the entire labor movement—and I don't think they will."

Meany's words were greeted with shouts and long applause.

The head of one of the striking unions, Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, told the audience that "this strike will be over when we get dignity for the workers and GE knows it. This strike is rallying the best in the American trade union movement."

Receiving the award from Meany, who was the first recipient, Van Arsdale praised the JLC for "its long history of opposing tyranny and fighting for the oppressed, The JLC has been in the forefront of democratic American life."

Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Van Arsdale's union, said the New York labor leader "has spent 45 years earning this award. Millions applaud the Jewish Labor Committee's choice of him, as they do the humanitarian work of the JLC."

Civil rights leader Bayard Rustin, after lauding the accomplishments of Van Arsdale in making job openings available for members of minority groups, criticized the Nixon administration for cutting the federal budget so as to take away these job opportunities.

"We had a little war on poverty going," Rustin declared, "but this alliance for the persecution of the poor and the aged, made up of southern and northern reactionaries, has no concern for those who are unfortunate and so they are creating confrontation, rather than meeting the problems that exist."

In opening the dinner program, Zimmerman, vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, praised the many years of relationship between the JLC and the American labor movement and predicted that the ties would grow even stronger.

Senate Votes 4% Raise for U.S. Employes

The Senate passed a "bare-bones" pay raise for federal employes, scaled down by its Post Office & Civil Service Committee in the hope of averting a presidential veto.

It would give most salaried federal and postal employes — those earning less than $10,000 a year—a 4 percent pay raise, effective Jan. 1, 1970.

Smaller raises would be given to those in higher grades—3 percent for the $10,000 to $15,000 bracket, 2 percent in the $15,000-$20,000 bracket, and 1 percent for the top regular pay grade. No immediate increase would be provided for the highest-ranking executives.

All employes would be guaranteed an additional raise of at least 3 percent on July 1, based on comparability adjustments with private industry.

The House earlier voted a 5.4 percent raise for postal workers, retroactive to Oct. 1, along with a new pay-setting procedure to keep all government pay scales more up-to-date with private industry patterns. Pres. Nixon charged that the House bill would "seriously undercut" the government's efforts to curb inflation.

Sen. Gale W. McGee (D-Wyo.), chairman of the committee which drew up the bill, said the amount of the increase was cut to "bare bones" so that it would not be vetoed. He said present salaries are based on comparability data for the summer of 1968. Since then, he said, living costs have gone up 7.4 percent.

The House has requested a conference to seek to resolve differences between the two bills, thus putting off final action until the second session.

Poverty Agency Kept Under Federal Control

mittee is expected to defang the Murphy amendment and pave the way for final passage of the OEO extension.

Before the House vote, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller and Federation Vice Pres. David Sullivan, chairman of OEO's Labor Advisory Committee, wrote all congressmen urging defeat of the state control substitute.

In many cases, Biemiller noted, this would put control over the program and allocation of funds "in the hands of those most unresponsive to the needs of inner cities."

OEO Dir. Donald Rumsfeld, a former Republican congressman, supported a two-year extension of the present law and said a state takeover "would prove to be a nightmare to administer."

Pres. Nixon formally endorsed Rumsfeld's position but said he hoped his OEO director could reach an accommodation with the Republican leadership in the House, which supported the state control plan.

No acceptable compromise was reached, however, and House GOP Leader Gerald R. Ford ended up voting against any continuation of the OEO after the state control plan was beaten.

While most Old Guard Republicans followed Ford's leadership, he lost the votes of some GOP members who had reluctantly gone along with the "southern strategy" on the voting rights issue.

One Republican congressman was quoted in the Wall Street Journal as saying, "I think some of our guys didn't want to look like they were kicking the blacks two days in a row."

Rep. Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.), chairman of the House Labor Committee, had postponed floor action on the OEO bill a week after the complex state control substitute plan had been unveiled at a press conference on the eve of the scheduled House vote.

At the time, the division in the House was viewed as extremely close and supporters of the state control plan were confidently predicting victory.

But when the showdown came, an alliance of liberals and moderate Administration supporters had the votes.

Diane Curry Gets Railway Clerk Post

Chicago—Mrs. Diane Curry has been appointed assistant editor of the Railway Clerk, it was announced by C. L. Dennis, president of the Railway & Airline Clerks and editor of the union's official organ.

Mrs. Curry's appointment fills a vacancy caused by the resignation of John McCarthy, who had been in day-to-day charge of the magazine for several years. McCarthy elected to remain in Cincinnati when the BRAC moved its headquarters recently to Rosemont, Ill., near Chicago's O'Hare Airport.

Mrs. Curry, a native of Westfield, N.J., had previously been with the Railway Labor Executives' Association. Since 1967 she had been assistant to the editor and worked on assignments for the union's research and education department.

Gutted in House:

Fight on Voting Law Shifted to Senate

The battle to preserve newly-won voting rights for black Americans living in the Deep South has shifted to the Senate.

There, a bipartisan civil rights alliance will seek to undo the mischief committed by the House when it rejected a proposed five-year extension of the 1965 Voting Rights Act. The House, by a narrow 208-203 vote, substituted the Administration's toothless plan for nationwide standards.

To make sure that voting rights legislation won't be pigeonholed in a hostile Judiciary Committee headed by Mississippi Sen. James O. Eastland, the Senate voted to instruct the committee to report a bill to the Senate floor by Mar. 1.

Thus, if a filibuster developed, civil rights supporters would have time to combat it without being caught in an end-of-the-session squeeze.

Labor and civil rights groups, while conceding some merit to several sections of the Administration bill, have sharply criticized the removal of federal supervision of voting laws in states which have past records of denying Negroes the ballot through a variety of subterfuges and intimidation.

Since enactment of the 1965 law, Negro registration in the affected southern states has increased by more than 800,000 and for the first time blacks have been elected to public office in southern communities where they constitute a large portion of the population.

Attempts to dilute their vote by gerrymander or making elective offices appointive have been blocked by the federal law.

The Administration's diluted voting rights substitute was widely viewed as part of the Republican Party's "southern strategy" aimed at winning over 1968 supporters of presidential candidate George Wallace.

Although the conservative coalition of most Republicans and Dixie Democrats is an old and powerful one, this was one of the few times it held together on a civil rights issue.

When the vote was announced, southerners in the House cheered and applauded. A bitter Clarence Mitchell, legislative spokesman for the NAACP and the Civil Rights Leadership Conference, termed the House action "a cataclysmic defeat for the civil rights movement."

The principal change under the Administration substitute is to abolish the present requirement for federal approval before election laws or practices can be changed in the states covered by the law. At present, proposed changes must be approved either by the Attorney General or by a federal court in the District of Columbia.

The principal change under the would authorize the Attorney General to file suit against any discriminatory voting law but would not hold up the law's application in the interim.

It would also ban literacy tests nationwide—not just in the states which were found to have used the tests for discriminatory purposes—and establish uniform residency requirements for voting in presidential elections.

Civil rights supporters have urged that these last sections be considered as separate legislation, with the Voting Rights Act continuing as the basic assurance against a return to racial discrimination in the areas where constitutional rights had been violated continually until the passage of the 1965 law.

The U.S. Civil Rights Commission, whose members are appointed by the President, sharply criticized the Administration substitute and called for extension of the 1965 law. The Rev. Theodore M. Hesburgh, chairman of the commission and president of Notre Dame University, said the Administration bill "would turn back the clock to 1957, relying on the slow process of litigation to keep up with rapidly enacted changes in the laws. . . . Now is not the time to gut one of the act's key provisions."

In contrast to the House GOP leadership position, Senate Republican Leader Hugh Scott and other Republican moderates are working with Democratic liberals led by Sen. Philip A. Hart to salvage the law.

eral and often superficial references to the dangers of inflation."

The committee expressed "serious doubts about the priority choices" in the Nixon budget.

The Senate showed its concurrence in the committee's viewpoint by adding still further funds for a number of programs in the bill which provided money for the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, the Labor Dept., the Office of Economic Opportunity and 11 smaller agencies.

One of its biggest increases, however, merely brought the anti-poverty appropriations up to the amount of the budget request. The Senate voted the full $2 billion sought in the budget, an amount $424 million higher than the committee had approved.

The HEW appropriation total—representing most of the money in the bill—came out $1.6 billion above the budget request and some $500 million more than the House had voted.

The differences between the two bills are among the numerous issues to be resolved before Congress ends its first session.

The last-minute Administration attempt to block passage of the mine safety bill apparently developed after the Budget Bureau expressed alarm at the cost of its black lung compensation feature.

For two years, the federal government would pay $136 a month compensation to single miners disabled by pneumoconiosis and to widows of those who have died from the disease. Higher amounts, up to a maximum of $272, would be paid to victims with dependents. After two years, the states would take over financing of benefits as part of their workmen's compensation programs.

In another reflection of the Administration's abrupt decision to oppose the bill, Labor Sec. George P. Shultz rushed to House leaders a letter opposing the compensation feature as an invasion of the prerogative of the states to develop their own workmen's compensation programs.

The House was unimpressed by both arguments. It defeated a Republican motion to send the bill back to a House-Senate conference committee by a 258-83 vote, and then passed the legislation, 333-12.

The bill also sets a strict dust ceiling for coal mines and gives mines up to six years to install anti-explosion equipment.

Senate concurrence was expected as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

In another development, the House voted to give Pres. Nixon standby authority which he does not want to control consumer and business credit during times of inflation. Despite Administration opposition, the bill passed by a 259-136 vote.

Major appropriations bills and the tax reform measure were on the congressional "must" list for action before the first session closed.

As a reward for the weekend and night sessions necessary to meet the deadline, congressional leaders extended the Christmas season recess by putting off the start of the second session until Jan. 19.

As far as pending legislation is concerned, the change of sessions has no effect. A bill that has passed one house of Congress, for example, does not have to be repassed in the second session.

plementary medical insurance, and all of the welfare programs, including medicaid and aid to dependent children."

He told the House that it is his "firm intention" to bring to the House floor by next March "a comprehensive social security bill" dealing with these programs.

Some 25 million persons on the social security rolls—nearly one out of eight persons in the nation—would benefit by the increase.

Mills said he will seek to have the House version of the 15 percent increase—without the additional Senate increases in minimum benefits—included in the final draft of the tax bill.

The tax conference committee, meanwhile, reported fast progress towards a compromise bill.

Full details were lacking as the AFL-CIO News went to press, but conferees expressed confidence that action could be completed before the Christmas recess.

There were three broad areas to be reconciled between House and Senate versions — the extent to which notorious tax loopholes will be closed, the degree of tax relief for low and middle income taxpayers, and the fate of various exemptions and benefits written into the bill at the urging of lobbyists for big business or special interests.

The next issue of the AFL-CIO News will be published on Jan. 3, 1970, because of holiday schedules.

Senate Voids Segregationist School Clause

The Senate voted to nullify a segregationist amendment the House had added to an appropriations bill financing federal aid to education programs—and the House later agreed to the change.

Under the House amendment, sponsored by Rep. Jamie L. Whitten (D-Miss.), the federal Office of Education would have been barred from cutting off funds to school districts which used so-called "freedom of choice" plans as a subterfuge to avoid desegregation.

A bipartisan civil rights coalition won 52-37 approval of a motion by Senate Republican Leader Hugh Scott to precede a slightly-modified Whitten Amendment with the key phrase, "Except as required by the Constitution. . . ."

Since Supreme Court decisions have held a number of freedom of choice plans and similar devices unconstitutional, the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare said the added language would permit continued enforcement of school desegregation.

The Administration had been silent on the issue when the Whitten Amendment was before the House, even though labor and civil rights groups had waged an active campaign against its passage. HEW Sec. Robert H. Finch supported the Scott motion in the Senate, however.

On the rollcall vote, 30 Democrats and 22 Republicans voted to nullify the effect of the Whitten Amendment; 19 Republicans and 18 Democrats voted to retain the House language.

The House then voted 216-180 to accept the Senate change.

Housing Plan Extended To Help Ease Shortage

Congress took another step toward meeting the nation's housing shortage by giving final approval to legislation extending present housing programs an additional year and adding new provisions to help more low-income families obtain decent living accommodations.

One new feature of the labor-supported bill requires that a new low-income dwelling unit be built for each slum home or apartment demolished as part of an urban renewal project. The new unit would have to be in the same city or county as the renewal project.

Another section of the bill authorizes $75 million a year in subsidies so that public housing residents would not have to pay more than 25 percent of their income for rent.

A new subsidy arrangement would for the first time allow the federal government to pay part of the operating costs of public housing projects. Rising maintenance costs have forced many public housing projects to raise rents substantially since present law requires operating costs to be met in full from rental income.

The legislation also allows higher per-room construction costs in areas where new public housing has been blocked by cost ceilings set when prices were considerably lower.

It provides additional money for government purchase of FHA and VA mortgages which, if the Administration makes use of it, will ease the critical shortage of home mortgage money. The legislation also would permit FHA insurance of mobile homes and lift the ceiling on FHA home mortgages.

Both the House and the Senate had added differing versions of an amendment which the AFL-CIO and building trades unions warned could be given an anti-labor interpretation. The intent was to prohibit any restrictions against use of work techniques or materials that would lower construction costs.

The milder House provision, applying only to experimental-type projects under the model cities program, was retained in the final version of the bill.

Ban Proposed On Unsolicited Credit Cards

Credit cards shouldn't be sent to people who haven't requested them, the AFL-CIO wrote a Senate Banking subcommittee.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller expressed labor's support for a credit card regulation bill sponsored by Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.), chairman of the Subcommittee on Financial Institutions. It would restrict the conditions under which credit cards could be sent without having been requested.

"The only question we have," Biemiller said, "is whether the mailing of unsolicited credit cards should not be banned outright, rather than indirectly discouraged as presently provided in the bill. We hope the subcommittee will give favorable consideration to an outright ban."

Biemiller also expressed the AFL-CIO's strong support for a provision of the Proxmire bill which would limit a credit card holder's liability for unauthorized use of his card to $50 and provide other safeguards.
